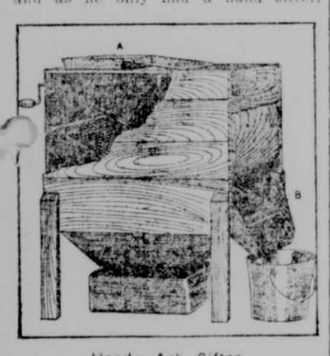
MANUFACTURING ICICLES.

Unique Method in Use in Germany for Producing Pure Ice.

The above photograph, reproduced from Nature, shows a method in use in South Germany for producing ice from pure water in winter. The photograph was taken last January in

The Icicle Factory.



Balingen, Wurttemberg. Says the paper just named:

"The illustration shows a large wooden framework in two stories, six meters (20 feet) square and six meters high. Each story is covered with a floor of 18 parallel beams, in the center of which a tube, encased in wood, rises beyond the upper floor. This tube is connected with the water-main, and the water issues through a rotating disk, which sends a moving spray on the beams. As the water drops from the beams icicles are formed, which reach the middle floor and finally the ground. The volume of water is regulated according to the temperature of the air, which may vary between —3 degrees C. and —18 degrees C. (27 degrees F. and zero F.). During low temperature 20 cubic meters of ice may be formed in one night. As the ice retains the shape of isolated columns, it is easily broken up and removed. The ice is then stored for use in summer."

HOME-MADE ASH SIFTER.

Not Hard to Make and It Does Good Work.

The attendant of a large furnace found it necessary to sift the ashes and as he only had a hand sifter, which made considerable dust, he decided to make a sifter, which resulted in constructing one as shown in the sketch taken from Popular Mechanics. A box one foot wide, 1½ feet high and 2½ feet long was secured and a hole one foot square cut in the top at A. A small hopper about three inches high with a lid covered this opening. The bottom of the box was removed and a hole made in the end at B about six inches wide across the box. A chute made from an old lard can was fastened in this opening as shown. A frame 11 inches wide, two feet nine inches long was made, covered with one-half inch mesh wire and hinged to the edge of the box at B on each side of the opening. An old curtain rod was bent to form a crank on the end and one in the middle and fitted to the top of the box as shown, for the purpose of shaking the frame covered with the wire screen. The bottom of the box was formed into the shape of a hopper and the whole device set on four legs high enough to place a box beneath the lower hopper and a pail under the end of the screen.

Handy Ash Sifter.

GOOD TO MOVE HEAVY ARTICLES.

knives, also the blade from the cutter bar and turned the mower over. This gave me a strong cross bar with bolt holes in it, to which I bolted a platform. Then a piece of heavy flat iron was bent and fastened to the under side of the handle, making a rest to keep the truck upright when not in motion. This, says Popular Mechanics, makes a strong, low down truck, which will handle a stove or other heavy article with ease.

A CONCRETE AQUARIUM.

How You Can Make One That Will Prove Artistic and Durable.

A very artistic and durable aquarium can be made of reinforced concrete and glass, as shown in the sketch.

Secure four pieces of glass, plate glass preferred, the desired size to make tank, say about nine inches wide, 12 inches long and 10 inches deep. Set the edges of the glass in a concrete base made about one inch thick. This can be done in a temporary wooden mold. Use good Portland cement in making and take equal parts cement and clean sharp sand mixed to the consistency of thin dough. Reinforce the base by putting in a wire screen, Fig.

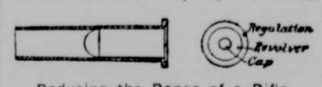
Concrete and Glass.

1, turning up the edges so the glass will rest firmly against the screen. Allow about one-eighth inch open space between the perpendicular edges of the glass. After the cement has set about 48 hours, mold the corners in any design desired, reinforcing them with wire, screws or nails, as shown in Fig. 2, also filling up the inside corners about one-quarter inch thick. Allow this to set for a day, after which paint the concrete with pure cement and water mixed to the consistency of paint. Put a thick coat of this cement paint on the inside bottom. After two or three days the aquarium will hold water perfectly.

The cement can be painted, enameled or bronzed, as desired, also a brass or wooden cover fitted to the upper edges of the glass.—Contributed by S. O. Safholm, Minneapolis, Minn.

SELF-CONTAINED MOTOR CAR.

How the Drawback to Such Car Has Been Overcome in Bavaria.



One of the drawbacks of the self-contained motor car for railroad use is in the fact that the power is self-contained. This statement may at first sight appear a little dense, but every type of self-contained motor car has the same disadvantage, this disadvantage being in the fact that the motive power and the car body are practically inseparable and it is impossible to care for the former in the same place and manner as other locomotive power on the road is cared for. It is also necessary to put the whole car out of commission whenever the motive power needs attention.

This disadvantage has been overcome by the Bavarian state railways in a manner which would seem adaptable anywhere. The Bavarian government has been operating self-contained motor cars for a number of years and, finding the above stated condition to be a great disadvantage, has discontinued the building of the self-contained type of cars in favor of a small, but very powerful four-wheeled locomotive which can be coupled to a light combination passenger and baggage coach and perform the service with equal satisfaction. The arrangement simply amounts to separating the motive power from the passenger compartment of a motor car and permits the former of being taken care of in the regular engine house.

REDUCING RANGE OF A RIFLE.

How the Old Springfield Rifle Can Be Made Safe to Use.

The country has recently been flooded with old model Springfield rifles.

Reducing the Range of a Rifle.

While these are very fine guns, they have too long a range for use in a thickly populated region. As the writer could not use a rifle that carried over 200 yards, he reduced the range by the following method:

Taking an empty regulation shell, 0.45 caliber, the head was bored out so that a 0.44 caliber revolver cartridge would fit snug. Then the head of the regulation shell was turned out, so that the head of the revolver cartridge would be flush, as shown in accompanying sketch. The writer writing in Scientific American says he is using these cartridges up to a hundred yards with good results.

Ruined Fire Alarm System.

For many years the residents of Murray, Ky., were notified of fire within the confines of their town by the discharging of guns, and this rather novel system proved so satisfactory that it was still in vogue up to within a few months ago. Then, however, came the night rider disturbances, and the discharge of guns became so frequent and misleading that in a number of instances the alarms for fire were disregarded. The mayor found it necessary to issue a circular, changing the alarm system from gun firing to the ringing of bells and blowing of whistles.

Fine Peal of Bells.

One of the most remarkable peals of bells in the world, both because of its size and elevation, has just been installed in the tower of the Metropolitan Life building in New York, 46 floors above the street.

Sunday School Lesson for July 18, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 17:1-15. Memory verse 11.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee."—Psa. 119:11.

TIME.—Paul was at Thessalonica five or six months, December, A. D. 50, to May, 51, and in Berea from May, A. D. 51, to August.

PLACE.—At Thessalonica, 100 miles west of Philippi, now called Salonica, the largest city of Macedonia, in Roumelia, Turkey.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

Teaching the Scriptures at Thessalonica.—Vs. 1-9. When Paul, Silas and Timothy were driven from Philippi they traveled southwest along the great military road which leads to Rome. At the end of thirty-three miles they reached Amphipolis, and thirty miles further along they came to Apollonia. As neither city was of much importance the three missionaries continued their journey on to Thessalonica, thirty-seven miles distant, on the gulf of Salonica in Macedonia.

Here was a Jewish synagogue, and an easy opening for preaching the gospel. They remained in the synagogue for three weeks until finally driven away by the Jews. Then they took up their headquarters with Jonas, just outside of the synagogue circle.

Here Paul formed the nucleus of a large and flourishing church, chiefly composed of Gentiles, and, although he supported himself in part by working with his own hands, yet he remained long enough to receive help twice from Philippi.

Paul had four methods of teaching the Bible to the people. First, he "reasoned with them out of the Scriptures," basing his reasoning on true facts, which they accepted. Second, he unfolded the truths of the Scriptures, and pointed out things they had not noticed, or applications which they had not understood. Paul was to them like the expert who points out to the poor farmer the rich mines of gold and silver beneath the surface. Third, he compared the scripture with scripture and with facts. Especially did he show that Christ had suffered. This description was one of the greatest difficulties in the Jewish mind. It seemed impossible that the victorious king, who was to reign forever, the Wonderful, the Counsellor, Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace, whose kingdom was an everlasting kingdom, including all nations, could be an humble teacher who died on the cross. But Paul showed them that only by suffering could Christ save from sin, and that by his having risen again from the dead, Jesus is a living and glorious king. Fourth, by living the Gospel, so that they could interpret its meaning by what he was and did.

As a result of his labors in Thessalonica some Jews believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas. The Greeks gathered in great multitudes, who were looking and hoping for a religious life.

The assault on Paul, Silas and Timothy was instigated by the "Jews which believed not" and were moved by jealousy or envy, because they were declining and the Christians were growing. The Jews used the rabble, vile fellows, as their instruments, and turning them into a wild mob they "assaulted the house of Jason," with whom the missionaries were lodging. The missionaries were not at home, but the mob dragged Jason and certain Christians before the rulers, shouting, "These that have turned the world upside down are coming hither also."

The charge against the missionaries was treason, for saying that there is another king, one Jesus. The same charge was made against Jesus before Pilate.

They were bound over to keep the peace by a sum of money, or property, which Jason and other Christians must forfeit if the missionaries were again the occasion of another riot. Hence Paul and Silas were immediately sent away secretly by night. They went to Berea.

Berea was inland about fifty miles southwest of Thessalonica. Cicero, in his oration against Piso, says that, unable to face the complaint at Thessalonica, Piso fled to Berea. So Paul may have gone to Berea on account of its seclusion. As usual they went to the synagogue where they were introduced by their escort of Christian Jews who left them at this point.

The missionaries remained at Berea for several weeks until another popular disturbance, stirred up by their Thessalonian enemies. Paul was secretly and hastily sent to Athens, while Silas and Timothy were to follow later.

The most important book in the world for study and reading is the Bible. It gives the largest, fullest, widest education. It educates all the faculties of the soul. It trains for the best life in this world, and for immortal life.

Home reading and study of the Bible daily is the most important means of becoming acquainted with its truths. The chief cause of the ignorance of the Bible, so often charged to the account of the Sunday school, lies in the neglect of Bible reading at home, the decadence of family prayers and family instruction. The Sunday school, especially where the International Lessons are used, is a great aid and inspiration to home study. The whole family read, study, and discuss the subjects together. No other scheme can accomplish this end so well.

Hunter's Pudding.

This is a nice, inexpensive winter pudding. One cup suet or fat salt pork, chopped fine, one cup molasses, one cup milk, three cups flour, three level teaspoons baking powder, one-half teaspoon clove, one-half teaspoon cinnamon, 1½ cups raisins, washed, stoned and chopped, 1½ teaspoons salt. Mix thoroughly, turn into a well-buttered mold and steam at least three hours. Serve with thin cream, hot liquid sauce flavored with lemon, or hard sauce.

English Molded Meat.

This makes a good emergency dish: Soak a quarter ounce of gelatine in a half cup good stock. Add when softened to one pound minced beef or veal (cooked), with herbs and seasoned to taste. Warm up, then pour into molds and let stand until cold. When ready to serve, turn out, decorating with hard-boiled eggs, a little chopped parsley and savory jelly.

Lamb Fritters.

Chop a cup of cold cooked lamb. Make a batter of one egg well beaten, two-thirds cup of milk, one-fourth teaspoon salt and one and one-third cup of flour sifted with one rounding teaspoon baking powder. Add the chopped lamb and stir well; drop from spoon into deep hot lard and fry to a nice brown. These are nice for supper on a cold night.

Oatmeal Pudding.

Take one quart of cooked oatmeal, add one cup sugar, two eggs, pinch salt, butter size of hickory nut, one cup chopped raisins, one-half teaspoon cinnamon, and one pint of milk, stir all together, then bake a golden brown. Eat with lemon sauce.

Delicious Economical Pudding.

Wash two tablespoons rice, then add two tablespoons sugar and one quart sweet milk; then put in oven and cook slowly for two hours; add flavoring, if desired, when done.

Best Way to Be Useful.

To make oneself beloved, says an old French proverb, that is, after all, the best way to be useful. That is one of the deep sayings which children think flat, and which young men, and even young women, despise; and which a middle-aged man hears with a certain troubled surprise, and wonders if there is not something in it, after all; and which old people discover to be true, and think, with a sad regret of opportunities missed, and of years devoted, how unprofitably, to other kinds of usefulness! The truth is that most of us, who have any ambitions at all, do not start in life with the hope of being useful, but rather with an intention of being ornamental.—Arthur C. Benson, "Essay on Friendship."

Mohammedan Serenity.

A Mohammedan people enjoy one great advantage over all others—they never suffer from the anticipation of that which is to come, and, as a natural result, they can always enjoy the present, although only a few hours may separate them from disaster, or even from death. Their implicit belief in an ordained future imparts a dignified repose and outward calm to all their actions. Thus in spite of the trials and troubles which threatened the state during my stay at Fez, a smooth surface of unchangeable serenity veiled the inner thoughts of every individual, from the sultan to the negro at his gates.—Blackwood Magazine.

When Men Become Free.

There is a time to come when governments will spring from the hearts of the people, and will be governments for the people. In that day all laws, all civil usages, all customs, will respect the interests of the community, and will not obstruct them. When men have perfect liberty, individually and collectively; when they are not only equal but free—free in the largest sense of the term "freedom"—then society itself will become a nursing mother.—Henry Ward Beecher.

IN CONFERENCE.

The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill is now in the hands of a conference committee representing the two branches of Congress, the duty of which is to consider all conflicting recommendations of the Senate and the House and report the bill in finally remodeled form. This is no light task, there being 847 amendments made by the Senate to the bill as adopted by the House. The committee, however, has a clear understanding of its work and has laid out a definite program, the execution of which is possible within a period of ten days. In the preparation of this, the Democratic members have not been consulted, the majority representation being evidently determined that there shall be no successful resort to tactics of obstruction in that quarter. If further difficulties are to arise, they may be looked for only after the committee has completed its work and reported back to the Senate and the House. What will then come, to pass is a matter of the gravest doubt. There are so many radical differences of opinion, not only between the majorities in the two houses, but within the majority elements themselves, that the outright failure of the bill is not an impossibility. This would be a most unfortunate outcome, in view of the amount of labor that has been expended by Congress in the revision of the schedules. At the same time, no matter what the issue may be the country at large need not feel disturbed. It is pertinently pointed out that, if the tariff bill passes, it will embrace no higher duties than those recommended by the Senate and no lower ones than those recommended by the House, so that business men and manufacturers know even now the best and the worst that may be in store. If the bill should fail, the Dingley tariff will remain in force and there will simply be a reversion to the statu quo ante, involving no disturbance of business. Hence there is no actual ground of apprehension. Nor indeed is there any evidence of apprehension. Congress having shown its hand and the extremes of revision having been laid down, the public mind is now at ease and the business recovery goes on without hindrance. It is uncertainty that hurts and of that there is an end.

THE OUTLOOK.

The government crop report last week was the most important contribution to the general stock of confidence in the future of business. The area of corn under cultivation is 109,000,000 acres, which is 7,200,000 acres in excess of the highest previous records. The condition of the crop is 6.5 per cent higher than at this time last year and 4.5 per cent higher than the ten-year average. The indicated yield is 3,161,000,000 bushels, which is 200,000,000 bushels larger than the bumper crop of 1906. The farm value of the 1908 crop was $1,600,000,000 and while the market price today is somewhat lower than a year ago, the increase in acreage and prospective yield will likely bring the total value of this year's crop up to the maximum. This is an immense amount of new wealth to be added to the general store by a single crop. The indicated yield of oats is also close to the previous record, and the indicated yield of wheat has been exceeded but twice in our history. The value of this year's wheat crop will probably be the highest ever realized. The basis for this expectation is the extremely small surplus remaining in farmers' hands from last year's crop. The government estimates this surplus at only 15,000,000 bushels, which is less than half the surplus held a year ago and is the smallest amount ever reported. Incidentally, the figures confirm the estimates of the leading bull speculators, and inasmuch as surplus stocks abroad are relatively as low as our own the prospects favor comparatively high prices for wheat and flour for the remainder of the year, unless consumers are forced to substitute other foodstuffs.

Despite the marvelous progress in industrial development, the United States maintains its position as the greatest agricultural producer of the world. Abundant yield and renumerative price therefore constitute one of the chief factors in the general prosperity of the country, and it is no wonder that this week's government estimates have been received with great satisfaction in all departments of trade.

HOW THE "GRANDFATHER" CLAUSE WORKS IN PRACTICE.

The result of the municipal election in Annapolis yesterday demonstrates in a striking way the effect of the elimination of the negro vote by the "grandfather" clause. The city, which is normally close, was carried by the Democrats so overwhelmingly that there was no contest. The registration was cut from 2100 to 1085, leaving but 46 negro voters on the books, while heretofore there had been 1000.

There may be room for difference of opinion as to whether Annapolis is better off under an election law which permits only white illiterates to vote, but the election returns there would seem to settle conclusively what the effect of the elimination of the negro vote will be. The test of the law is irrefutable evidence of what it will do if applied to the whole State.

It is still possible for the advocates of the disfranchising law to advocate its merits, but it is no longer possible for them to contend that it will not make Maryland a one-party State. The purpose of the law is to do with the State exactly what was done in Annapolis, and the manly thing to do is to meet the issue.

The elimination of the negro vote will make both the city and the State so strongly Democratic that it will be almost impossible, at least for many years, to turn the party out of power, no matter what sort of government is given at the City Hall or at Annapolis. In discussing the alleged benefits to be derived from adopting the amendment, its advocates should be honest enough to admit its logical result.—Baltimore News.

POSTOFFICE RULINGS.

We have had occasion several times to refer to and comment on the attitude of the postoffice department toward the publishers of newspapers, particularly in the matter of mail privileges and the competition of the government in the printing of stamped envelopes.

A stanch champion of the rights of newspapers is the Buckeye Informer of Delphos, Ohio, Carl A. Jettinger, editor. Commenting editorially on several questions of vital import to publishers and printers, the Informer says in part:

"There surely can be no getting around the fact that if the publishers of this country permit the fast multiplying hair splitting rules and regulations the postoffice department has been making in late years to stand it will soon become a difficult matter to enter a publication as second class mail matter and the very existence of papers depending on the second class mailing privileges will be constantly in danger. The assurance by one of the assistant postmaster generals that there is no intention to harm the country newspaper because it is not the one these rules and regulations are aimed at should make the country publisher feel no safer than, for instance, if he got into the hands of cannibals who, while they were devouring one of his companions were assuring him that he had nothing of that kind to fear because he was not fat enough. There is no telling when they would consider him fat enough, and there is no telling when the postoffice department, if it is granted the power, will consider the circulation of the country newspaper at second class rates just as harmful to its interests as it now considers such circulation of the mail order journal and, to a certain extent, of every publication that depends a great deal upon the copious circulation of sample copies to build up its subscription list. If publishers continue to permit the department to use them as tools to harm each other, rather than as persons who have the welfare of their own craft at heart, it will not be many years before freedom of the press in our country is a farce and the power of the press a myth."

For County Commissionor.

In this paper today Mr. Walter M. Lowdermilk, of Selbysport District, makes formal announcement of his candidacy for the nomination by the Republicans as a member of the Board of County Commissioners. Mr. Lowdermilk is a native Garrett countain, a successful farmer, an honest, law-abiding citizen and a member of the M. E. church at Selbysport. Should Mr. Lowdermilk be nominated he will make and excellent public official.

COL. J. M. BURNS WAS VERY PAINFULLY INJURED

In a Driving Accident on the Dennett Road on Thursday Afternoon.

While Col. J. M. Burns, of Monntain Lake Park, was out driving last Thursday being accompanied by Miss Thistle, a house guest, and his driver, the horses attached to his carriage took fright at at an automobile that was passing and after kicking loose from the traces one of the animals plunged forward and disconnected the neck yoke from the pole of the vehicle. This allowed the pole to drop to the ground and added fright to the almost frantic horses and they gave a leap when one of the driving reins parted and they with a plunge upset the carriage, throwing the occupants out.

Col. Burns received a slight concussion of the brain, a number of scalp wounds and other bruises to his body, while Miss Thistle's arm was painfully wrenched and a slight scalp wound resulted. Since the accident Col. Burns has been confined to his bed and is being kept perfectly quiet by his family as serious results may ensue should he at this time overexert himself.

Drs. McComas and Legge attended the injured occupants of the vehicle, which was almost wholly demolished.

Would Not Lose Bunch of Politicians.

Some of the newspapers of West Virginia presist in publishing to the world that if Maryland were to gain the stretch of land they claim from the county of Preston, that West Virginia would lose a number of her citizens, now in puolic life, especially Hon. James S. Lakin, president of the board of control; Attorney General Conley, ex-Governor W. M. O. Dawson, and several of the attaches of the several departments. It is apparent that those publishing such reports are not conversant with the fact. The strip of land claimed by Maryland is less than a mile in width at the widest point—at its nothernmost point—and as it extends southward narrows to almost nothing. Terra Alta, the home of Mr. Lakin, is about four mile from the Maryland line and in the event the latter state succeeds in its claim of territory, the home of the president of the board of control would still be over three miles in direct line from that state.

Kingwood, the home of Ex-Gov Dawson and Attorney General Conley, is much futher westernward, and of course would not be affected by the boundary line. The same condition is true of every person holding a minor position in the state goverment.

When asked who came to his home and would not leave, Henry Bonig said, "only a girl baby."

Miss Myra Bill, of Lonaconing, is visiting her grandfather, Mr. Chas. Bill, Sr.

Mrs. May, of St. Louis, Mo., is spending the summer with her aunt, Mrs. Henry Swauger. Mrs. May is a daughter of the late Perry Shultz who left Grantsville many years ago and died in St. Louis several months ago. Her mother was a Gottfelty, a sister of Mrs. H. Swauger.

Mr. and Mrs. Angie Williams, of Punxatawney, Pa., who had been visiting Mrs. Williams' sister, Mrs. Lewis Swauger, returned home on Tuesday after a two week's visit.

Prof. C. E. Bender delivered a very interesting lecture in the M. E. church on Sunday afternoon, and at Salisbury, Pa., on Sunday night. The title of the lecture was "Peace or War, or the Barnacles of Our Conntry."

A Week of Moving Pictures In the Auditorium at Mountain Lake Park, July 18-24th.

Messrs. Pearce and Scheck of Baltimore, will give a series of moving picture exhibitions at Mountain Lake Park every evening during the week beginning July 19th. These films will be the very latest biographical and historical films on the platform. The civil war will be depicted one evening, including the surrender at Appomattox; the stirring scenes in the life of Napoleon and Josephine and other similar films.

The exhibition will begin each evening at eight o'clock. The usual admission fee of twenty-five cents will be charged and ten cents for children under twelve years of age.

PARTY REACHES END OF THE BRADDOCK TRAIL

Many Points of March Heretofore Missed, Were Uncovered by Lacock Party.

After traversing a distance of at least two hundred miles, covering the Braddock trail from Cumberland, to Braddock, Pa., Prof. J. K. Lacock, of Harvard University and his party disbanded at Braddock on Saturday evening. Dr. G. P. Donehoo of Connellsville, accompanied the party during its entire tour, and returned home Sunday.

By means of the most accurate maps obtainable and original documents procured from both the English and United States governments, the party was able to cover every point of the march and locate many places heretofore unnoticed by historians and seekers after knowledge in regard to the trail of Braddock and Washington and their Indian contemporaries. In many places, the real Braddock Road was far from the pike and it was often necessary to make a wide detour to cover the trail accurately so that the men walked many miles each day. Dr. Donehoo estimates that about 260 photographs were taken during the expedition by the official photographer, E. K. Weller, of Washington, Pa. The latter also intends to make a number of postals illustrative of the most interesting points in order to create a more active interest among the people of this historical locality.

On account of lack of interest there are few people who know the histories of Gists' Plantation, Crawford's Spring and Stewart's Crossing and many points so near home that they are traversed practically every day. By means of maps made by the chief engineer of the Carnegie Steel Company it was found that the present site of the P. R. R. station at Braddock was the scene of the greatest slaughter during Braddock's defeat. It is the intention of Prof. Lacock to write a book on the historical points in Braddock's expedition while other members of the party expects to write articles on the historical points in Western Pennsylvania. No systematic arrangement of these facts has ever before been given to the public and a number of the schools throughout the region will insert in their curriculums courses in local history. For this reason if for no other the publication of these books will be timely.

That there is a great deal of historical interest being manifested, is proven by the fact that parties are touring the region all the time in search of material. On July 24, the members of the Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania will follow the Forbes Road to Ligonier in order to study the history of the locality and beginning August 15, Prof. Lacock will cover the course of the Forbes Road from Pittsburg to Philadelphia.

It has been suggested by interested citizens that money left from celebrations such as that of the recent Fourth of July and Centennial could be profitably spent by placing markers upon the sites of historical points in and near Connellsville. Metallic markers have been placed at similar places near Uniontown at a cost of $22.50 each, and will last always.—Connellsville Carrier.

BITTINGER.

Wheat harvest and hay-making will begin in this neighborhood this week and reports seem to indicate a good yield of wheat, but the hay crop will be a little light.

Mr. and Mrs. Elias Orendorf were visiting relatives over in Pennsylvania on last Saturday and Sunday.

Mrs. K. A. Bittinger and Mrs. E. S. Brenneman made a business trip to Salisbury, Pa., last Monday.

Mrs. S. O. Wiley, who has been spending a few days with relatives here, returned to her home near Elk Lick, Pa., last Tuesday.

Messrs. Clarence and Frank Brenneman drove up to Oakland last Monday to see the placing of the machinery preparatory to beginning work on the section of the state road to be constructed near that city.

Charles Bender and family, of Salisbury, Pa., passed through this village last Monday.

Miss Mary P. Farr, Field Secretary of the Maryland State Library Commission, spent a few hours in this village last Friday afternoon. She was accompanied by Prof. and Mrs. Loraditch, of Oakland.

John H. Stark made a business trip to Confluence, Pa., one day last week.

Miss Dollie Winterburg, of Grantsville, is spending this week with her sister, Mrs. T. B. Wiley, at this place.

Amos H. Reckner, of North Glade, spent a part of last week among his old friends and neighbors in this section.

Charles Sechler and family spent a few days last week with relatives at Keim, Pa.

JOHN MCCARTY.

B. & O. trainmen on the Third Division will miss the familiar face of watchman John McCarty, at 37 Water station, on the seventeen-mile grade, who passed away last Monday. For nearly thirty years John McCarty faithfully stood on guard for broken rails, landslides and the many dangers that attend railroading on the mountains, and frequently he averted wrecks by his watchfulness. He was a devout Catholic and a good Christian man and was known by every employe traveling over the mountains. His body was interred Wednesday at noon in St. Peter's cemetery at Westernport.

COME IN AND GET ACQUAINTED

A GRAND TOURNAMENT.

To be Held at Mountain Lake Park Saturday Afternoon. August 14th.

One of the events of the Mt. Chautauqua, in which Oakland and all the surrounding country will be interested, is the annual Tournament to be held at Mountain Lake Park, Saturday afternoon, August 14, under the direction of Col. J. M. Burns, on behalf of the Women's Civic Club. The proceeds from the tournament will be used by the society in improving and beautifying the Park.

The arches will be put in position and everything in readiness for practice in the Bishop field, just back of the Overlook Inn, by Saturday, the 17th of July. A cordial invitation is extended to everyone to come and practice with a view of entering the tournament.

Beautiful and appropriate prizes will be offered to the best riders, and fine horses will enter the contest. Some of the young men, of Maryland, are determined that West Virginia shall not walk off with all the best prizes as they did last year, consequently a spirited contest is anticipated. A small entrance fee for the riders will be charged and an admission fee will be required of spectators. Dr. Henry McComas has been appointed marshal and Mr. G. Semmes Hamill assistant manager, which is a guarantee of the success of the undertaking.

Mr. Bernard Giessman, son of Mr. and Mrs. George Geissman, of Oakland, came home from Washington last Saturday night and will remain here during the remainder of the summer. He is employed in a clerical capacity by a large mercantile house in Washington.

We regret to note the illness of Miss Bertie, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Lawton. With indications that Miss Lawton was to undergo an attack of typhoid fever when she was first taken ill, her physicians have succeeded in at least staying the attack and she is now very much improved.

A postal received yesterday morning from W. O. Ison, of Washington, D. C., mailed at Mackinac Island, Mich., states that he is there for a few days on his way to the Yellowstone Park by way of the great lakes. Mr. Ison also states the trip is quite an interesting one and that he is having an enjoyable time.

Mr. and Mrs. S. E. Bolden, of Johnstown, Pa., former residents of Oakland, are here on a visit to their many friends and relatives. Mrs. Bolden will leave this afternoon for Cumberland, where a day or two will be spent with an aunt while Mr. Bolden will remain here until the latter part of the week.

Garthright is offering some most excellent bargains in suitings, waistings, shoes, hats, to close out summer goods, and will take fresh made, sweet butter and fresh eggs, will pay 22 cents for each and part cash, for immediate delivery. Will pay, 20 cents lb. for young chickens and 12 cents for fat hens, if brought in at once. 20-2t

Judge Robert R. Henderson, who is spending the summer at Deer Park, was in Oakland yesterday and stated that his health is being greatly benefitted by his sojourn in the mountains. Judge Henderson was accompanied by Mrs. Henderson and Mr. and Mrs. Lambert, former residents of Oakland, who are also domiciled at Deer Park.

Attorney General Isaac Loeb Straus, of Maryland, who was expected in Oakland yesterday afternoon to go over and view the boundary line as surveyed a number of years ago by the engineering corps of Maryland and West Virginia did not arrive, having been detained in Baltimore on other business. Mr. Straus will probably arrive here the first part of next week.

Attention is directed to the professional card of Dr. W. W. Grant, D. D. S., who has located in Oakland for the practice of his profession, with rooms in the McComas building, adjoining The Republican building. Dr. Grant recently graduated from the foremost school of dentistry in the country and is eminently prepared to successfully practice his profession.

Mr. Robert Fundenburg, of Johnstown, Pa., son of Mrs. E. Fundenburg, of Oakland, is here on a visit to his mother and sister. He is accompanied by his little daughter, a petite lass of twelve summers. For a number of years Mr. Fundenburg has held the position of chief electrician at the municipal plant of Johnstown, where he is well and favorably known.

The farmers are going to have more money than ever before to spend during the next crop year. They will do their very important share toward making prosperity generous and universal. Cotton does not match the outlook for for the great cereals, but the price of that staple of the south is likely to offset, wholly or in large part, the decreased yeild which is now foreshadowed.

The Annapolis election comes in good time to prove that while the "grandfather" clause will do excellently well what it is intended to do, it also has the inevitable result of giving one party a "lead pipe cinch." Its advocates cannot take credit for the good the law is supposed to do without assuming blame for whatever bad results accompany it. There is a boomerang attachment to the amendment which can't be got rid of.

STRANGER KILLED NEAR CRELLIN

Was Later Indentified As Charles Wilson, of Amesville, Ohio.

Last Monday morning a man boarded the log train of the Kendall Lumber Company at Crellin, stating that he wanted to go up the river from that point, fell from the truck upon which he was standing and was instantly killed by the wheels of the truck following passing over his body.

The Kendall Company notified the officials here and arranged with undertaker Bolden to have the remains prepared for burial, which was done and the funeral will occur this morning.

The only thing about the dead man's person that would lead to his identity was a letter written over a year ago and directed to Charles Wilson, postmarked at C[illegible]e, Ohio and signed Charles Gunder. Telephonic communication with the writer of the letter established the man's identity and later his mother was located at Amesville, Ohio. She requested that the funeral be held here.

The man was smooth shaven, dark complected, and was about five feet nine or ten inches tall. He was fine looking.

Sheriff Austin Brown returned to Oakland Monday from Sykesville to which point he had taken on Sunday night Frank Foley, who was adjudged insane by a jury of inquisition last Friday. The hearing was held in the court room before Judge Henderson.

The number of marriage licenses issued during the first weeks of the present month total less than half the number issued by Clerk Tower for the corresponding period of June. From last Wednesday until yesterday at noon but five licenses were issued and one was refused on account of the applicant being under the age precribed by the law governing the issuance of licenses.

Mrs. Will Faust and two daughters, and Mrs. Peter Doonan and infant child departed yesterday for Mt. Lake Park, Md., where they have taken up their residence for a term of two months at this beautiful summer resort. They are located at beautiful Shadyside Lawn, near the central section of the resort. Mr. Faust accompanied them to Mt. Lake yesterday, saw them comfortably installed and then returned home on the night train.—Grafton Republican.

Mr. Charles G. Watson, of Frostburg, Allegany county, was Oakland last Friday when he called upon the majority of the practicing attorneys at the Oakland bar and launched his candidacy for the nomination for Chief Judge on the Republican ticket and thus become an opponent of Judge Boyd, who will without a doubt be nominated by the Democrats to succeed himself. Mr. Watson received considerable encouragement from those upon whom he called and it is stated that he will make formal announcement of his candidacy within the next day or two.

County Treasurer, William E. Hollinger, of near Guard, was in Oakland Monday and Tuesday on business connected with his official duties and also in his private capacity as a saw mill operator. Recently Mr. Hollinger and Sheriff Austin Brown purchased a valuable tract of timber land in District No. 9 and were about to operate it when they were stopped by an injunction sued out by the Circuit Court by J. L. McKenzie who claims ownership of the land purchased by Messrs. Hollinger and Brown. Some time must necessarily elapse before the case is determined and in the meantime operations have been suspended by the buyers of the tract.

Ex-Judge Daniel Wilson, of near Kitzmiller, was in the city Tuesday on business connected with his agricultural affairs and expressed himself as being quite satisfied with the prospects for a good crop of things generally grown upon the farm. While the Judge has retired from active politics he still takes an interest in the doings of his party and is an advocate of the direct primary for the nomination of the ticket this fall. Mr. Charles E. Hilleary, of the same section of the county, was also a visitor to the city Tuesday and he is likewise favorable to the nominations being made by a direct vote of the people. While these two gentlemen were free to express themselves as favorable to this mode of making the nominations others held an opposite view, but it seems to be the consensus of opinion that the nominations be made under the direct primary plan, as the Republicans committed themselves to this at the county convention held two years ago and upon which the ticket was then nominated and elected.

Marriage Licenses.

The following licenses have been issued by Clerk E. Z. Tower, since our last report:

William B. Talbot, of Berrvburg, W. Va., and Mabel Right, of Bealington, W. Va.

Charles Whitehead, of Cortland, Va., and Sallie Partilo, of Greenwood, Va.

Asbury Phares, of Hodon, W. Va., and Belva Conrad, of Hacker's Valley, W. Va.

Ira Cassidy, of St. George, W. Va., and Ruth Simmons, of this county.

Two with request not to publish.

By an Act of the General Assembly of Maryland, passed at the January Session, 1896, being Chapter 356, Section 45, it is provided that all county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of levy thereof; and all taxes paid on or before the first day of September a discount of three per cent. shall be allowed; and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum until paid. The treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt for taxes so paid, but the discount allowed on the county taxes by this section shall not be made to any person or corporate institution unless the whole amount of state and county taxes due by such person or corporate institution for the current year be paid when the same is made.

All persons who owe 1898 tax will please make immediate payment.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man arraigned by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda, through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.—He entered the cabin and discovered the English woman and her maid.

CHAPTER VIII. — Stephens quickly learned the wrong vessel had been captured, Lord Darlington's private yacht, the lord's wife and maid being aboard. He explained the situation to her ladyship.

CHAPTER IX.—Then First Mate Tuttle laid bare the plot, saying that the Sea Queen had been taken in order to go to the Antarctic circle.

CHAPTER X.—Tuttle explained that on a former voyage he had learned that the Donna Isabel was lost in '53. He had found [illegible] in a huge case of ice on an island and consumed much gold.

CHAPTER XI.—Stephens, however, consented to be captain of the expedition. He told Lady Darlington. She was greatly alarmed, but expressed confidence in him.

CHAPTER XII.—The Sea Queen encountered a vessel in the fog. Stephens attempted to communicate, which caused a fierce struggle and he was overcome. Tuttle, finally squaring the situation. Then the Sea Queen headed south again.

CHAPTER XIII.—Under Tuttle's guidance the vessel made progress toward its goal.

CHAPTER XIV.—De Nova, the mate, told Stephens that he believed Tuttle, now acting as skipper, insane because of his queer actions.

CHAPTER XV.—Stephens was awakened by crashing of glass. He saw Tuttle in the grip of a spasm of religious mania and overcame him. The sailor upon regaining his senses was [illegible].

CHAPTER XVI.—Tuttle committed suicide by shooting. Upon vote of the crew Stephens assumed the leadership and the men decided to continue the treasure hunt, the islands being supposed to be only 200 miles distant.

CHAPTER XVII.—Tuttle was buried in the sea. Lady Darlington pronouncing the service. Stephens awaking from sleep saw the ghost supposed to have formed the basis for Tuttle's religious mania.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Upon advice of Lady Darlington, Stephens started to probe the ghost. He came upon Lieut. Sanchez, the drunken officer he had humbled in Chile. He found that at Sanchez' inspiration, Engineer McKnight played "ghost" to scare the men into giving up the quest.

CHAPTER XIX.—Stephens announced that the Sea Queen was at the spot where Tuttle's quest was supposed to be. The crew was anxious to go on in further search. De Nova and Stephens conquered them in a fist fight. Lady Darlington thanked him.

CHAPTER XX.—The Sea Queen started northward. She was wrecked in a fog. Stephens, De Nova, Lady Darlington and her maid being among those to set out in a life boat.

CHAPTER XXI.—Ten were rescued. Stephens saw only one chance in a thousand for life. Lady Darlington confessed her love to Stephens and he did likewise.

"It would be almost a miracle," I faltered, the words fairly forced from my lips by her insistence. "This is the beginning of winter in the stormiest ocean on the globe. God could do it, but not man."

Her head sank, the white cheek touching my sleeve, but the fearless gray eyes were still open, gazing straight into mine.

"Then it is the certainty of death," she said soberly. "Death together."

My heart leaped as though it had received an electric shock.

"Together! you mean—"

"That I should rather be here, facing death with you, than anywhere else alone," she exclaimed swiftly. "Oh, I can say it frankly now; say it here before you and God; say it in all purity and honor. Perhaps to-night, perhaps to-morrow, somewhere amid this awful waste of waters we will go together into eternity. What are the dictates of men to us now? What meaning is there any longer to the hideous requirements of the world? We are beyond them all. Here, now, we can be ourselves, ourselves. To-night we are free; to-night I can hear you speak what I have already read in your eyes, and am not afraid to hear it."

"You—you love me?"

"With all my heart and soul."

With everything else blotted out, with all else forgotten, I sat speechless, gazing down through the mist of tears into her eyes.

CHAPTER XXII.

In Which I Understand My Lady.

She rested motionless, her cheek barely touching my sleeve, her eyes filled with love, her hands in mine. Then I heard her voice, soft as a whisper, the breath of her lips on my cheek.

"You will not misjudge me; surely you can not. Those words would never have been uttered in any other circumstances. Not that I am afraid, not that I am ashamed or regretful; but nothing else could ever have set me free. Now we must know, understand each other—we must die with our hearts open, our souls clean. You really love me? trust me? believe me to be a worthy woman?"

"With all my soul I do."

"Oh, I know you do. It is because I know you do that I wish to tell you my story. It is my love which makes me so anxious that you should understand, so when the end comes we can go together, loving each other, and not afraid. Do you recognize me? Have you ever realized who I am?"

I could only shake my head, wondering at the strange question.

"No? And yet I have known you ever since that first long talk we had together in the cabin. It seemed so odd, such a strange freak of destiny, that you should have been associated in any way with my old life, and yet the very fact that you were, first created the bond that has since drawn us together. You were no longer a mere sea adventurer, but an old-time friend and equal. From that day all was different. I could fight it back, but could never conquer what that discovery meant. Oh, how small this world is! Did you ever hear of Doris Winslow?"

A moment the vague, clouded memory eluded me, tantalized me. Then in a flash the revelation came.

"My sister's chum at Wellesley?"

The tears sprang glistening into her eyes, her handclasp tightening.

"Yes; does it seem possible? You never knew me, except by that name. My father died during the second year of my attendance there; then mother and I went abroad, and my education was completed on the continent. I am not finding fault, but—but it was all most unfortunate; it brought me into real life with a false understanding of everything — wrong ideals, wrong standards. We were known to be wealthy, many considered me beautiful; my mother's one ambition was to achieve recognized social standing in Europe, and from the first I was destined to be a means to that end. My education, surroundings, social environment, were all shaped with this purpose in view. In spite of myself the result was accomplished.

"I was merely a girl of 17, desiring little but a good time, and accustomed all my life to the guidance of others. Lord Darlington joined our party in Italy, and we journeyed together for a week through the Italian Alps, finally going on board his yacht as invited guests for a cruise in the Mediterranean. He was most attentive to me, yet I gave it scarcely a thought. I hardly realized what was taking place—what it all meant, but—but one day we went ashore, and—and we were married at the British legation in Athens. That day I was a careless girl; the next morning found me a woman, regretful, aroused from a dream, yet yielding to the inevitable. Whatever I suffered was borne alone; not even my mother ever heard me complain."

She sat looking forth over the crests of the sea, the moonlight reflecting back into her face. The sail swung in and shadowed her.

"Within a month we went to England, to Darlington hall, where everything was at my command, and later to London, during the social season. I had all that the world seems to value at my feet and at first I managed to be happy after a fashion. The excitement and exhilaration kept me alive and interested, but in time the glitter and artificiality of it all wearied me; more and more deeply I realized the sordid manner in which I had been sold, and I grew to hate those things which had purchased me. It was not Lord Darlington—he was more father than husband, humoring me in every way, and secretly regretful for his part in the transaction. I became ill, begged for the sea, and we went aboard in his yacht. He was not unwilling, but to my mother it proved a constant hardship. Only her anxiety to prevent any rupture between us caused her to go on board. Yet even when I had recovered health I would not go back; that life would have killed me. Out in the open I could breathe and live; it yielded me courage to continue as I was."

She bent forward, bringing her face once again into the revealing moonlight, her eyes frankly open to mine.

"I only wish I could make you realize how drearily lonely that life became. There was no knowledge of love to complicate the situation, and at first I even felt a sense of gratitude toward Lord Darlington for many acts of kindness and the consideration shown me. This changed, however, as I began slowly to comprehend the selfishness of his motives—that his actions arose merely from a certain pride in my youthful appearance and the advantages to be derived from my wealth. My mother soon alienated my affections by always allying herself with him. Finally I had no one to whom I could turn for comfort or advice. I felt entirely alone, and grew silent, suspicious, and adverse to all social pleasures. The vows of marriage rested lightly on Lord Darlington, but for that I did not greatly care, except that the knowledge snapped the last weak bond between us. Almost wild to escape from Europe and its torturing memories I finally planned an extensive yachting trip around the world. I was impulsive, headstrong, even hopeful that I might be permitted to invite a few congenial friends and sail alone. To my surprise Lord Darlington expressed pleasure in the idea, and even persuaded my mother to accompany us."

Her face sank suddenly into her hands, her body trembling.

"I bore it all smilingly, and enjoyed the sea. But I was a woman now, bitterly resenting the manner in which I had been bartered in the matrimonial market. I knew nothing of love, except as I perceived it in the lives of others, but I was hungry, starving for it. We arrived at Valparaiso; this strange adventure occurred to me, and—then I met you."

Her hands went out again to me, and I caught them eagerly.

"That—that day in the cabin, I—I knew you for one of my own class; I knew you for a true man, a gentleman; I—I read the love in your eyes, and I should have been an angel not to have welcomed it. Oh, God knows I tried not to do so! I prayed for help to resist my own heart, but the help was not given me. Now I comprehend it was not meant that I should resist. The end was in sight even from the beginning. Love is more than ceremony, and can make even death sweet. I have no sense of evil as I look into your eyes; I have come into my inheritance, the rightful inheritance of every woman—love. Even if it is only for a day, it is mine—mine by the gift of God. Oh, Jack, Jack, I have waited so long, so long, and now all I can say, all I desire to say, is, I love you!"

Oh, that scene! that desolate, dreary, God-forsaken, hopeless scene—the heaving waters, the cold sky, the ice-gleam, the awful expanse of barrenness all about. Did ever love come to mortal before or since in such a spot, or amid such utter helplessness? But I forgot all, though even as I bent to her lips she begged me, falteringly, not to touch her yet. There, in the heart of that Antarctic sea, castaways, drifting to what seemed certain death, we found in this confession a happiness that the world without would have sternly denied us. Ay! and we were stronger for it, braver for it; our eyes aglow, our hearts pulsing to the one great music of the universe.

"Jack, I Have Waited So Long, So Long, Now All I Can Say Is, I Love You."

"Tell it to me," she whispered smilingly.

"I love you."

"And I am happier than in all my life before."

We spoke but briefly as we sat thus, my hand firm upon the tiller, my eyes never forgetful of those great surges smiting us. Indeed, there was little to say, for we had no future to discuss, no plans to formulate. We could only live out the night, with the morrow a blank before us. Yet there was nothing of all this in the girl's face upturned and happy, nor did I permit my eyes to mar her happiness. We were together, understanding each other, and for the moment that was enough. Yet in some way my pulse beat stronger, my will to conquer this demon sea became mighty. God helping me, this love-life should not end here—end in mystery and oblivion; those restless waters should not overcome us forever. I would fight them for her sake and my own! The stars and waves defied such determination, yet I only stiffened in my seat, a new strength animating my body, a new faith stimulating my soul. Fifteen hundred miles! Father of Mercy, guide us! Yet it had been done, and it might be done again.

"What is it, Jack?" she questioned softly. "Of what were you thinking?"

"Of the stiff battle ahead of us, dear; the fight for life and love across these leagues of ocean."

"For life and love! Do you mean you dream of reaching safety?"

"I mean to struggle for it; to do all a man and sailor may. If we die, now, sweetheart, it will be to lose more than ever before was possible."

Her cheeks flushed instantly, her lashes drooping.

"No, no; if we win safety it will only be to lose all else. But the thought is impossible; no skill, no courage, no strength of arm or heart could ever work such a miracle of deliverance. I will not dream it, for how could I go back, go back to that old life again with my heart full of love for you? That would be a fate worse than death; it would be dishonor."

I did not answer, did not even look into her face.

"Surely you do not mean it, Jack?" almost pleadingly, her hand reaching blindly out for mine. "You can not bring me to such shame, such trial?"

"It is not shame," I answered earnestly, all my soul revolting against the word, "it may be trial, but it is not shame. In the face of death you have confessed you love me, and in the face of death I shall endeavor to retain that love. I should be no man if I did less. Shame! Do not use that term between us. What was there holy or divine in the selling of you to that English peer? Why should that act of mere barter hold us apart? The law of God is paramount to the law of man. Doris, you are mine, although you yet withhold the pledge of the lips; mine everywhere and forever; mine here in this desolate reach of sea, and mine yonder in the great world, if we ever again attain it. I never will yield you up to another; never relinquish my claim. Against nature and man I shall endeavor to hold what is my own."

One moment I gazed down into her eyes, penetrating to the gray depths, and perceiving there a sudden outburst of passion which she did not even seek to conceal. It was a revelation absolute and complete, a revelation never to be forgotten. Yet she did not touch me, did not answer in words, and in another instant her glance turned away out over the grim desolation of waters. I was still looking at her, intoxicated by what I had seen, when she pointed excitedly forward.

"In heaven's name, what is that?"

Hardly had my glance shifted when Kelly leaped to his feet, his voice raised in a wild yell.

"Mither of God, sorr, there's a ship!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

In Which We Board a Derelict.

I saw the sleepers cast off their coverings and rise up startled and staring, but I could only gaze dumbly at the apparition before us, doubting the evidence of my own eyes and unable to utter a sound. At that first glance I believed the thing illusion, a mirage of the deep, a shadow-ship mocking us with semblance of reality. The cold silvery light played along her glistening side, causing the whole extent of the vessel to gleam back into our eyes like a great mirror, while the very shape and form of the silently gliding specter appeared a survival from out the dead past, a ghastly relic of centuries gone uplifted from those somber depths below. The silence, gloom, the dim outline of the great hull, the strange glimmer of it from bow to stern; all combined to make it seem a ghost-ship, sported with by the waves. It moved slowly under the impelling power of the wind beating against the broad high stern, the blunt bows scarcely rippling the water, passing almost directly across our track, appearing more like a painted picture than anything constructed of wood and iron. Out of the night, dim, visionary, it swam before us, a weird, uncanny thing, chilling the blood with its ghostliness. I rubbed my eyes, staring at the silvery reflection, my heart pulsing with a horror which set me trembling.

Yet, little by little, my mind began to apprehend the truth, my reason to grasp the details. Mist or reality, there directly before us floated what appeared to be the outlines of a ship—battered, wrecked, odd in form—yet a ship, moving upright upon the surface of the water. Good God! what a mad dream of the past was represented yonder! Those round, blunt bows, the broken bowsprit, heavy as a mast, forking straight upward; the great carven, shapeless figurehead beneath; the wide, elevated forecastle deck; the seemingly tremendous thickness of the bulwarks; the strange slope of deck and rail amidships; the immense remnant of a foremast towering in splinters; the broad, square stern, even overtopping the height of the peaked forecastle. That was a grim thing to meet with in those waters.

"Stand by, men!" I called, the tremble still in my command. "If the thing yonder be wood and iron we'll board her."

Not a voice responded, their bodies tense and motionless, every eye still on that dim, phantom gleam. With clenched teeth I pressed the tiller hard down, and the bows of the longboat headed straight in. Suddenly De Nova leaped to his feet.

"Ship ahoy!" he yelled, the note of fear sounding shrilly.

In the intense silence I could plainly hear the heavy breathing of the excited men.

"There will be no use hailing," I said, strengthened by the sound of my own voice. "If that be a vessel, her crew are dead a hundred years."

"And by God, it is, sir!" ejaculated Johnson, who was on his knees in the bow. "It's a real ship, all right. That's ice that glitters; she's sheeted in it from stem to stern."

I saw it myself then, every doubt of the real character of this drear visitant vanishing; my courage came back in a rush.

"Ay, ay, lads, Johnson has hit it right. That's a ship for us, and now we'll see what she looks like on deck. Get a grip with your boat-hook, Johnson, on that raft of stuff trailing from the forechains, when I lay her alongside. Strike the wood if you can, the cordage is likely to be rotten."

He missed it at the first attempt, the hook slipping on the ice; but as I brought the longboat around once more, he succeeded in getting a grip upon something sufficiently firm and held on, the fellows staring up silently at the bulging side, and touching the thick sheathing of ice as though half demented.

"Make fast. Break the ice out of that ring, Kelly, and pass a stout rope through it. Now furl the sail, the rest of you. Fend her off, Cole; that's all right, keep your oar there. Mr. De Nova, you will remain in charge of the boat. I'll see what she looks like aboard; Johnson, come along with me."

I picked my way forward into the bows and stood up, striving to obtain some kind of a grip on the forechains which would enable me to haul myself up. Everything I touched was ice, so thick as to render objects shapeless.

"Give me a lift, Kelly; easy, now, until I get a handhold. There, that will do, my lad."

It was a slippery, dangerous perch, the vessel plunging somewhat, but the upper ice was slightly powdered with snow, yielding a little purchase, and I finally discovered a brace for my feet which enabled me to reach down and assist Johnson to scramble up beside me. Fortunately the bulwarks were not so high proportionately as wide, and we succeeded in sliding over them, coming down rather heavily on the solid deck. Here the snow made walking possible, although underneath the ice was thick and smooth, compelling caution. All forward was a terrible raffle of wreckage, a jumbled mass of tangled spars, with the great topmast and all its hamper right where it had fallen, a portion of the port bulwark smashed flat. A hummock of ice rose like a great hill from abaft the butt of the foremast, which stuck up maybe 30 feet, clear over the forecastle deck, leaving everything shapeless and grotesque. Where the slope was steepest, the wind had swept away the snow leaving the ice beneath clear; and there, frozen completely in, like a painted picture, was the fully revealed body of a man. I never saw any sight more grewsome than that ice-shrouded figure; the arms outstretched, the short, black beard rendering more ghastly the white, dead face. I gripped my hands onto Johnson's shoulder, and he was shaking like an aspen, his own face colorless in the moonshine. I wheeled him about savagely.

"Don't lose your nerve, man. You've seen dead men before. Come, there's nothing to do here; we'll try how she looks aft."

He followed me like a dog, casting uneasy glances backward over his shoulder. The deck was clearer of raffle beyond the foremast, a great gap in the port bulwarks amidships showing where the wreckage had probably been swept overboard. The mainmast had been ripped out, leaving a great, ugly gash in the deck plank, and in falling had so smashed flat one corner of the cook's galley that we could look in through the jagged opening thus left. All the front portion was snow and ice, but the further extremity appeared dry enough, revealing a brick oven, a table screwed to the wall, and an overturned scuttle of coals littering the deck. It was not a desirable spot, yet would afford protection from the frosty night wind, and be much better than the open boat. Besides, I realized how those others must feel down there, bobbing up and down against those ice-caked sides.

"Johnson," I said, my eyes wandering toward the dimly revealed front of the after-cabin, which appeared utterly shapeless under its mantle, "We've got quite a job ahead of us to break through this wreckage. I'm for having the rest of the crew up to help us. Climb over into the main-chains and cut out some steps with your knife. We'll have them drop back there and unload. Then the women won't be obliged to see that dead man for'ard."

He was some minutes at the task, and I occupied the time in kicking aside some of the litter in the galley and making the dreary interior a bit more decent, having the men pass up some spare blankets, and spreading them out on deck. Finally Kelly and the negro scrambled up, and between us we succeeded in lifting Lady Darlington and Celeste over the icy bulwarks. The latter clung sobbing to De Nova, but my lady gazed about her wonderingly, her eyes full of questions. Without speaking we stowed them away under shelter.

"She is certainly a relic," I paused long enough to say, "one of the old-timers in these seas. From the look of her she must have been locked up in the ice south there for a century."

"Do you expect to sail her northward?"

"I hardly know yet what to expect; that remains to be seen. She seems to ride the water stanchly enough and there is fully 30 feet of mast standing yonder. Anyhow, this deck at present is better than an open boat."

"But—but it is all so ghastly, so ghost-like—Celeste is fairly crazy from the horror."

"It is merely the effect of the moonlight glimmering on the ice; everything is ice wherever your eyes turn. But you are safe enough here, and with daylight the ghostliness of it will vanish."

"Where are you going now?"

"To break into the cabin; then we will have a decent place in which to stay—perhaps a chance for a fire. It is not likely to prove a long job, and I will be back to you shortly. Don't let the night shadows frighten you so."

She smiled back into my eyes bravely enough, although I realized the effort of will that it cost; and so I left her endeavoring to cheer the girl, who was sobbing wildly, with her face buried in her hands.

The men joined me as I stepped without, crunching the light snow under their heavy boots, and staring uneasily about them as though the whole adventure was a dream. Lord! and no more could I shake off that same impression as I surveyed the scene aft. A boat, bottom up, the planks

INDUSTRY AND MECHANICS

ILLUSIONS OF A PASSING CAR.

Why a Wheel Sometimes Seems to Revolve Backward.

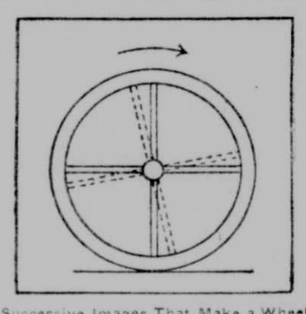
Under this heading, in The Autocar, Charles F. Street notes and explains the fact that at night a moving wheel frequently appears to revolve abnormally, at times going too slowly, again appearing to stop, and still again seeming to turn backward. Under similar conditions, if a walking stick be twirled in the hand, a series of distinct images will be observed at intervals, their distance apart depending upon the speed of whirling. We read:

"These illusions are only obtainable in the light emitted from an electric lamp supplied with an alternating current. The alternating current. . . . changes its direction, in some cases 40 times per second, and in others as many as 90 times per second.

"In order that the current may change its direction, there must be an instant in every reversal when there is a momentary but entire cessation of the current, and this cessation necessarily affects the emitted light in the form of a very short flicker.

"Owing to a peculiar property of the human eye, these cessations of the light, when the eye is viewing any fixed object, are not noticeable. . . .

"In the case of the moving walking-stick, an impression is gained as to the position of the stick at an instant of maximum illumination. This impression is retained by the eye, and the various positions occupied by the stick during the period of less bright light are not appreciated. . . .



"Suppose that a wheel is under observation, and that an impression is formed in accordance with the position of the spokes, and that the view is then obstructed for a time, during which period of obstruction the wheel, having ten spokes, say, is turned through one-tenth of a revolution.

"If the obstruction referred to be removed, and another observation of the wheel be made, there would be absolutely no evidence that the wheel had been turned at all, the spokes being all alike in appearance, and now occupying a similar position as before.

"This is exactly what happens when a wheel is viewed in an artificial light supplied with alternating current. . . . Therefore if the speed of a wheel be such that the spokes occupy the same relative position to the car every time the light reaches its maximum value, the sensation gained with regard to the movement of the wheel is that it is not revolving at all, and this speed can be defined as synchronous speed."

If the wheel is revolving at a speed slightly less than synchronous, then the first impression of the spokes is as shown in the figure by the full lines, and the next is obtained when the spokes are in some position as shown dotted behind the first. The wheel thus appears to revolve backward—the jumps from one position to the other being unnoticed. If the speed be greater than synchronous, the spokes appear a little further ahead each time, and the wheel appears to be moving slowly forward.

"Another illusion is obtained by watching the wheels of a passing car through a length of distance of, say, ten yards from the observer. Such a view is almost unique in demonstrating the well-known fact that the top of a rolling wheel moves at twice the speed of the center of the wheel, and infinitely faster than the bottom of the wheel, both relative to the earth."

Successive Images That Make a Wheel Seem to Revolve Backward.

THE CONCRETE BOAT.

Italian Engineers Succeed in Constructing Such Vessel.

The success of Italian engineers with concrete as a material for building boats is exerting an influence on marine experts of other countries to such an extent that a large number of experiments are in progress with results that may mean much for the future.

Concrete has, without doubt, many excellent points as a shipbuilding material. In the first place it offers less resistance to propulsion in water than wood or steel, and no painting is required. In the second, the cost of concrete boats is about one-half that of steel and the maintenance cost is comparatively nothing.

Its strength and practical indestructibility is also a great factor in its favor. In a recent test made by the Italian government, a 1,000-ton concrete boat was rammed by a much larger steel vessel. The result was serious damage to the steel craft and very little harm to the concrete boat. Various trials of this nature have led the Italian government to consider armoring its warships with concrete.

"BLAME that pigheaded Schmidt!"

Squire Hardy was in the sitting room talking to his wife. "To think of his kickin' just because the little schoolma'am is bound to celebrate the day and wants leave to use the schoolhouse!"

"He's a well meaning, peaceable neighbor, Hiram," said the squire's wife placidly.

"So's horses and cows. Gimme folks that's got some public spirit in 'em. Why, there ain't been a mite of public improvement done this ten year back.

"Oh, now, Hiram, we've got the postoffice."

"Yes; much thanks to the rest of 'em! It was me worked and kicked and badgered till I got them a triweekly mail, and much use they make of it!"

"I don't rec'lect much public improvements ever being in Hardyville," said Mrs. Hardy dryly.

"There would 'a' been," said her husband testily—"there would 'a' been if the Americans had stayed here and the Germans had kept away."

"Sho, Hiram! You can't say but what the German folks keep the church and schoolhouse going."

"Goin'—yes, goin' to rack and ruin all the same! Schoolhouse leakin' like sixty, and catch 'em taxin' themselves for a new roof! I wonder Miss Atworth can stay in the place, her and the children mirin' shoe mouth deep in mud to get to school in the winter. Hello! Here comes Jack with the mail bag."

A little while later Squire Hardy was in the act of distributing the bag's small contents when two farmers walked in without even stopping to stamp the mud off their cowhide boots. Mrs. Hardy kept on placidly knitting beyond the fireplace. She was used to such invasions of the sitting room, from which she had removed the carpet soon after the postoffice was granted to the sleepy settlement.

"Draw up to the fire, Mr. Gates," she said hospitably. "Take that rocker, Mr. Schmidt."

Mr. Gates kicked his feet against the andirons to rid them of clay and snow.

"Cold day," he remarked, settling his coonskin cap more firmly on his head. "What's this I hear about the new teacher?"

"Well, what?" snapped the squire, looking around.

"Some say she's dead set on gettin' up them doin's on Washington's birthday."

"Well, s'pose she is?" said the squire. "She ain't askin' nothin' but the schoolhouse for an evenin', and I've got power to let her have that. I'm school agent, ain't I?"

"I don't say the contrary, but to my way of thinkin' she's just a-wastin' time over a lot of foolishness. Hey, Schmidt?"

"Yah, das ist so!" assented the man in the rocking chair as he took his pipe from his mouth. "I tolt mein poy I shust dook him oudt of school and put him to voork ven I hear some more of dose crazy idees."

"Crazy? Nothin' crazy about it!" interrupted the old squire hotly.

Mr. Gates gave a sniff. "They say she's had a piano hauled out from the city, too," he said. "Hope she don't intend to levy on the parents to pay for it. She'll get nothin' out of me. I'll tell her that right now."

"WHAT'S THIS I HEAR ABOUT THE NEW TEACHER?"

"Shucks!" cried the squire as he handed Schmidt his Zeitung. "Neither of you needn't worry. She's too smart to expect to get blood out of turnips."

"Vell, all I haf to say," was Schmidt's parting remark as he wound his blue woolen muffler about his neck, "if she keeps on mit dose voolishness I dake mein Karl oudt of school right avay alretty. Dot vos better dot he voork as to vaste his time so."

"Poor little Miss Atworth!" sighed Mrs. Hardy as she watched the two men tramp off together. "I'm powerful glad she's boarding with us. The whole neighborhood is down on her newfangled ways. I'm going right out now and make something extra nice and hot for supper. It's pretty near sundown, and she'll come in soon all worn out with her day's work."

The little teacher did need the good cheer and "extra nice" supper that awaited her in the cozy kitchen, for she had felt much discouraged as she trudged homeward through the falling snow. Her pupils had nearly all been telling her the same thing that day. It was that their parents scouted the idea of helping her to celebrate Washington's birthday.

"How could the poor children learn patriotism?" said Mrs. Hardy. "That big room upstairs in the schoolhouse was built for a public hall. It has not been opened for fifteen years for any kind of an entertainment, not even a magic lantern show. It is the same old treadmill existence year in and year out. The children don't get their lives brightened—no public holidays are celebrated here, not even the Fourth of July. How can they love the country?"

The upshot was Miss Atworth's determination to celebrate Washington's birthday. The indifference or hostility of the parents had but roused her American spirit, even to the resolve that she would bear the entire expense herself if none would contribute from their plenty.

"Ten dollars," she reflected, "will buy decorations and material for costumes and stage curtains. Another $10 will rent a piano. Most of the children have never even seen one. All my spare time must go to getting up the entertainment, and all my savings too. Well, I'm glad. I guess I can give up so much for my country."

Not a particle of encouragement did she get from any of the parents except Peter Dowling, a one armed veteran of the civil war, and he was much more discouraging than he meant to be.

"Go on, I wish you luck, young lady," he would observe. "You can count on me for anything a one armed man can do. But what's the use? I've tried and tried to get some 'Merican sentiment into those youngsters. 'Tain't no go, and never will be. But you can count on me to hooray for you all the same. I'll be thar if nobody else is."

Miss Atworth's programme, besides the decoration of the schoolhouse, comprised tableaux and the recitation of patriotic poems and addresses by her larger pupils, but most of the children soon received strict orders to hurry home at 4 o'clock to attend to the milking and evening chores. They were also kept at work till the last possible minute in the morning. But with only noontime and recess for practicing their parts her enthusiasm worked wonders.

"It ought to be a grand success," said Miss Atworth as she took a final approving survey of the decorations the afternoon of the 21st. "Only it's a little too warlike. I wish I had an old fashioned pruning hook to hang across that sword between the windows."

"Mr. Schmidt has one," volunteered Sarah Gates. "But he's so mad about our wasting so much time, as he calls it, that it's as much as a fellow's head is worth to ask him for it. I heard him tell pa that he was going to keep Karl at home tomorrow night."

"Keep Karl at home!" cried Miss Atworth in dismay. "He couldn't be so mean as that!"

Karl was the brightest pupil in her room, a big, manly boy of sixteen. He was kept at home every spring and fall to help with the work, although his father was not poor. She had taken an especial interest in him from the first, had drilled him carefully in his declamation and counted on him as the star of the entertainment.

Miss Atworth locked the door and started rapidly homeward. What would she do if Karl must be left out of the performance? A quarter of a mile brought her to the lane leading from the pike to the Schmidt place, and there she stopped with sudden resolve.

"I'll beard that old lion in his den and ask him for his pruning hook. That will be an excuse for going and will give me an opportunity to plead Karl's cause."

It was nearly dark when Miss Atworth ran up the squire's front walk and danced through the house into the kitchen.

"Oh, such luck!" she cried gayly. "I went to see Mr. Schmidt, and some good angel prompted me to speak to him in German. It was such bad German—perhaps that's what pleased him. Anyway, it thawed him right out. He lent me his pruning hook and showed me over his barn. Of course I admired his fine cattle, and then, as he got more and more pleased at my showing such an astonishing lot of sense, I praised Karl so highly that he made a complete surrender. He is coming tomorrow night to bring the whole Schmidt family, from the old grossmutter to the baby. Hurrah for Washington's birthday!"

Never had the old public hall held such an astonished and delighted audience as the one that crowded into it that memorable night. Gay festoons of bunting, countless little flags and wreaths of evergreen transformed the dingy old place completely. A large picture of Washington placidly beamed from its place of honor. Over and around it, reaching almost across the stage, was draped a great silken flag, borrowed for the occasion.

"It's enough to make even a graven image feel patriotic," whispered Squire Hardy to his wife as the children's sweet voices made the room ring with the grand old national airs.

Declamations followed each other in rapid succession. Then came a scene, with recitations, in which Uncle Sam and all the states of the Union took part. The very air seemed charged with the little teacher's electrical spirit of patriotic enthusiasm.

It was at its height when Karl came forward to give the famous speech of Patrick Henry. His delivery was so much better than the rehearsals had led her to expect that even Miss Atworth was surprised. He seemed to find an inspiration in the crowd. A storm of applause followed the "Give me liberty or give me death!"

"What shall we do?" she whispered in dismay as the persistent clapping of many hands called him back. "I wish you had prepared for an encore."

"Oh, I know!" said Karl, and in another instant he was on the stage again.

In the deep hush that followed his clear, musical voice rose in German. He was reciting "Mein Vaterland." Old grandmothers who knew but a few words of English rocked themselves back and forth in excited delight; Mr. Schmidt beamed with vast smiles; many an eye grew dim, thinking of the old beloved home across the seas. But the boy was thinking of his own native country. There was no mistaking his meaning as he turned in closing to wave his hand toward the portrait and the flag. "My fatherland!" he cried, with true feeling, and then, after a moment of general surprise, deafening applause broke out.

As it subsided Miss Atworth stepped forward to announce the last song, but Peter Dowling, his face aflame with new delight and old memories, rose, stalked up the aisle as if unconscious of all the eyes fixed on him and swung himself up on the platform with one long step.

"Friends," he began, "I've been livin' kind of dead among ye for many's the year. Now I wan't to say a word or two. I ain't no great at speechifyin', but these old songs and pieces we've been a-listenin' to have spirited me up like the trumpet does an old war horse.

"I want to say that I fit for that old flag, and yet, livin' here so long and never a celebration for young or old, I'd half forgot my patriotism. It's our schoolteacher has woke me up to seein' the truth.

"I propose that we all get out our pocketbooks and throw in to get a handsome flag to fly over this schoolhouse. Take an old soldier's word for it, there ain't no greater inspiration anywhere to make a fellow put in his best licks and come out on top. Now, Miss Teacher, I'll just get the sense of this meetin'."

He paused a moment, then turned to the audience: "All who want to express their thanks for this evenin's entertainment and are willin' a collection should be took say 'Aye!'"

Such a storm of ayes followed that Peter caught up his slouched hat and began to pass it around with his only arm. Dimes and quarters clinked into it, while an occasional dollar showed how deeply selfish hearts had been stirred by the uplifting influences of the hour.

Miss Atworth seated herself at the piano and beckoned to the bewildered Goddess of Liberty to lead the states again across the stage. Some of the smaller ones straggled sadly out of line, but as Karl, at a nod from his teacher, caught the great flag from its place and stood with it in the midst of them every voice rang out full and true on the chorus:

Yes, we'll rally round the flag, boys,
We'll rally once again,
Shouting the battlecry of freedom!

People seemed loath to go when it was all over. They came up to the teacher with awkward expressions of pleasure and appreciation.

"I'll never forget this night," drawled one faded, overworked woman, to whose eyes the rich colors and tinsel of the stage decorations had seemed a part of fairyland. "That music was so sweet, and my little Meta looked like a picture with her hair curled and that beautiful dress on you made her. I really didn't know she was so pretty. I'm going to fix her up and get her a lot of nice things after this."

"Well, it was worth while," said the little teacher as she dropped into a chair at home, too tired to take off her wraps.

"Indeed it was," answered the squire. "Jake Schneider's new patriotism rose so he said he'd put a walk on each side of the school for half a mile, even if nobody 'd help him. Then a lot of 'em began to talk it over. The upshot of it was that old Schmidt is goin' to give the logs, and they're all goin' to work tomorrow to hew them off and stake them down."

The next Monday morning Karl stopped at Miss Atworth's desk to say joyfully: "Oh, teacher, father was so pleased! He is going to hire another hand and let me keep on till the end of the term."

"Then I need never regret my sacrifice," thought the happy girl.

That celebration was the beginning of better times in Hardyville. When the doors were barred for vacation and the grass grew rank on the bare playground the new flag still floated.

The Partners

By M. QUAD.

Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.

Among the applicants answering the advertisement of Klein & Klippert for a stenographer was Miss Rose Williams of a suburban village. Both partners were old bachelors, and when the advertisement was inserted Klein said to Klippert:

"There will probably be a hundred girls come tomorrow, and as I know more about human nature than you do I will see them and pick out the one we want."

"But as I know more about stenography than you do it should be left to me," was the reply of the partner.

They wrangled over the matter for ten minutes and then agreed that both should receive and question the applicants. When Miss Rose entered the office each partner said to himself that she would do, no matter whether she knew anything about stenography or not. Each tried to impress upon her mind the fact that he was fatherly and kind hearted and wished to run an orphan asylum. Klein wanted to offer her $20 a week, and Klippert wanted to offer $5 more, but they finally settled on $15 to start with. This was $5 more than they had intended paying, and the bookkeeper wondered if the well known economy of the establishment was to fly out of the window. When the terms had been settled and the applicant had departed, to reappear on the morrow, Klein hitched about on his chair for a couple of minutes and then said:

"As my room is rather the largest and lightest, I am willing to make a place for the young lady. Did you notice the lines of sorrow around her young mouth? I shall speak very gently to her."

"There is a fine, light space in my room for the young lady," replied Klippert, "and I will take her in there.

"SHE WILL EXPECT ME TO INVITE HER OUT TO LUNCH."

There is a sad look about her eyes, as if she had some great grief, and I shall not expect her to do much work."

They disputed for half an hour over the point, and next day Miss Rose was given the hall between the office rooms of the partners. It was a gloomy, contracted space, but she made no complaints. Each partner had made excuses to address her half a dozen times when it came half past 11 o'clock. Then Klein passed into the room of the other and said:

"You seem to have lots of business with the new girl this morning. If you are not more careful she will become afraid of you."

"I was going to say the same thing to you," was the prompt reply. "I have simply been treating her in a fatherly way. I think she has lost her natural father, and that's the reason she looks so sorrowful."

"But she will expect me to invite her out to lunch. I am the senior partner, you know."

"But I was intending to do that courtesy myself. It belongs to the junior partner."

"But I contend that it would look forward in you. Remember, she is a very timid girl."

"I shall be gentleness itself. You with your brusque way would certainly frighten her."

They went out into the store to argue the matter out, and it took so long to do it that Miss Rose had gone to her lunch when they returned to ask her to go with both. The partners felt that the other was to blame, and at half past 1 o'clock, in order to get even with Klippert, Klein called the stenographer into his room and dictated a letter and then said:

"Miss Williams, your work has proved so satisfactory that your salary is raised to $18 per week."

She expressed her thanks and backed out, but scarcely had five minutes passed when Klippert called her in to ask if she was satisfied with her salary and to add before she could reply:

"You take hold of the work so well that I shall make your salary $20 a week. If you are in sorrow and trouble don't hesitate to ask my advice. It is $20 a week and advice. My partner is so busy that you hadn't better ask him anything except as to strict business."

Klein had been in the habit of leaving the store every afternoon at half past 4. On this occasion he hung about until 5. Klippert and the employees left at half past 5. Klippert sauntered after the new stenographer to see what car she took. He had just ascertained when he encountered his partner. They eyed each other suspiciously for a minute and then lied. Each had a ready excuse on his tongue. Next morning at the store the senior partner called the junior partner into his room and gravely said:

"Mr. Klippert, I should be grieved to know that you were following Miss Williams to the car, but the more I think of it the more suspicious your conduct appears."

"But what were you doing there?" was promptly asked.

"Business unconnected with the store called me to the spot."

"Same here."

"Um!"

"Um!"

"I would suggest that neither of us ask the young lady to lunch. She might misconstrue our action."

"Just what I was about to suggest. We will go out together, as heretofore."

But things rankled in the mind of the senior partner. As a matter of fact, he had gone to the car half an hour ahead of the girl to make sure that she took the right one for home and did not go sauntering off into the swamps and become a victim of the Black Handers. The junior partner had come upon him and wronged him in thought. He did the only thing he could think of to get even. He called Miss Rose in and raised her salary to $22 a week.

The junior partner was not at all satisfied with the situation. He had followed the stenographer to the car to see that the bookkeeper, who was known to be a masher, didn't do the same. There he had met his partner and been looked at distrustfully. In wronging him the partner wronged Miss Rose, and he called her in and dictated a fictitious letter and added:

"I am pleased to say that our work was never so well done before, and I wish to inform you that your salary has been advanced to $25 per week."

Miss Williams came to her place on a Wednesday. On Saturday afternoon there was a half holiday. On Saturday afternoon also Mr. Klein met Mr. Klippert in the village where the stenographer lived. Each was sauntering about when he met the other. They came to a dead stop and glared and scowled. Each wanted to ask the other what he was doing there, but he didn't ask. Klein finally took Klippert by the arm and walked him to the car, and when both were seated and headed for the city he said:

"Klippert, it's hard times in business."

"You bet!"

"We don't need a stenographer."

"Not in the least."

"We can save that $25 per week."

"Every cent of it."

"And we will do it?"

"We will."

And on Monday morning Miss Williams received a letter from the firm that owing to her inexperience her services would no longer be required.

Lucinda's Dreadful Dream.

"I've had some dreadful dreams in my lifetime," said Lucinda, "but never any half so dreadful as one I had last night. I shall be miserable till I know whether it's coming true."

Of course everybody wanted to know what the dreadful dream was, and Lucinda continued:

"Why, I dreamed my coat was ruined!"

Chorus of commiserating groans at this.

It seems that Lucinda has lately bought a new suit, and the coat didn't fit her exactly, and so she took it back to have it filled, and it isn't to come home till next Wednesday, and last night she dreamed that it had come home and that it was worse than it was before—that they had made a mess of it and the coat was ruined.

Now, isn't that a dreadful dream? Truly? Why, if Lucinda had dreamed that she had fallen from the top of a tall mountain or been dropped from a flying machine or something like that, then she would have waked up the minute she began to fall and so have known right away that everything was all right, but as it is she's got to wait till next Wednesday to know if that dreadful dream is coming true.—New York Sun.

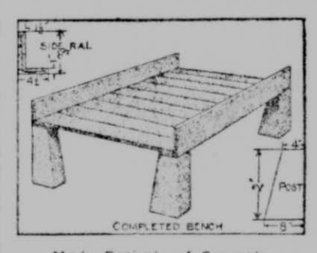
Money in China and Egypt.

Coins were made in China so long ago, it is said, as the year 2250 B. C., but they could not have been other than portions of metal cast into portable shape, such as were all the earliest moneys. In Egypt, the cradle of civilization and commerce, strange to say, there was no imperial coinage. Copper, silver and gold were used, as elsewhere, to indicate values, but they were manufactured into lumps, shaped sometimes like brick, and in the case of gold and silver were molded in rings, like the ancient Irish money of ten centuries ago. It appears almost inconceivable that a people who created the pyramids and erected such magnificent temples should have been entirely ignorant of coins. Yet it is certain from the statements of Herodotus that such was the case. The first coinage of money in Egypt was not struck to assist the Egyptians themselves in their commercial dealings, but, rather, because the foreign merchants with whom they traded, the Greeks and the Phoenicians, demanded some medium which would have the guarantee of its value apparent on it and which would circulate for that value.

DO TREES INCREASE RAINFALL?

Prof. Thomas Shaw Thinks Further Data Is Needed Before Deciding.

The opinion is very prevalent that the relation is close between the presence or absence of trees and rainfall. It may be that such is the fact, but the evidence is not so clear on the whole on this question as could be desired. Take, for instance, the story told by the weather records kept at Bismarck, N. D. For the ten years commencing with and including 1875, the annual precipitation was six inches more than it was during the ten years following. During the first period almost none of the soil had been broken up. During the second period, quite a proportion had been broken up. The trees in the locality were about the same as during the first period. During the third period the trees had increased through the planting of groves and yet the average increase in the rainfall was only six inches.



During the first period referred to, the lakes in the Dakotas were filled to overflowing. The water in Devil's lake at that time came up to the site of the present town. The water in the lake bed is now at least five miles from the town. Is it not easily supposable that a period may come again when the rainfall will again be as great as it was in the ten-year period commencing with 1875. If this were to happen, doubtless Devil's lake would fill its banks again.

The same line of reasoning may be applied to Minnesota. In 1894 and one or two of the years following, the weather was so dry that many of the shallow lakes went dry. On every hand the statements were made that dry seasons had came because the Minnesota forests were being cut away. But what happened? During seasons following these lakes refilled. The present season the greatest flood took place in the Minnesota and Mississippi rivers that has occurred for many a day. It is well to look for further data with reference to the relation between forests and rainfall.

CONCRETE BENCHES.

How They Can Be Made by the Farmer Himself.

The accompanying sketch shows the construction of parts to build a concrete bench for the greenhouse. The parts can be made in a metal or wooden mold and reinforced with expanded metal. The side rails are made in an angle as shown and are about six feet in length. The bottom pieces are 1 inch thick, eight inches wide and in any length to suit the space. The posts are two feet high and have one side perpendicular, and the other three sides inclined to make the top four inches square and the bottom eight inches. The straight side is placed toward the walk or wall, whichever it may be. A correspondent of Florists' Review says that the weight of the soil and plants holds the side rails so firmly that an ordinary man has not strength enough to pull one of the pieces out.

HORTICULTURAL NOTES.

There are 2,815 members in the Wisconsin Horticultural society—the largest, we believe, in the country.

It cannot be said that the Japan plums are rushing many fruit growers into great profit.

It is a fact that trees along highways, trees in towns and cities and trees in groves amid agricultural regions render the atmosphere purer. They by their foliage absorb hurtful gases, which would otherwise be breathed by the inhabitants of the densely populated cities, thereby modifying diseases, lessening the dangers of epidemics and in many ways improving the healthfulness of communities.—New York Farmer.

The time for the production of ashes is at hand. Now the wood ashes should not be thrown out in the back yard, the middle of the street, or any place, just to get rid of them. Unleached wood ashes makes an excellent fertilizer for blooming fruit trees, and should be preserved for this purpose. Keep them under cover, in a safe place where there can be no danger from fire, and next spring there will be plenty of valuable fertilizing material to harrow in under the fruit trees.—Vick's Magazine.

A New Sulphur Wash.

During the past season the department of agriculture has made an important discovery that the self-boiled lime-sulphur wash is not injurious to peach foliage when properly made and will not produce russeting and other injurious effects on apples. Furthermore, it has been found to be about as effective as a fungicide as the standard Bordeaux mixture. Extensive experiments have been carried on during the year by the department on nearly all of the common fruit diseases which are preventable by spraying and it has been demonstrated that the above mixture is a very useful one.

COL. ROOSEVELT SHORT OF FOOD IN THE DESERT

Sends an English Hunter Ahead to Get Supplies From His Host.

NAIRASHA, British East Africa, July 12.—Colonel Roosevelt arrived at the handsome estate of Commander Frederic Athenborough about noon today, after his party ran short of water and provisions in crossing the desert. News of his arrival was brought here from the other side of Lake Niarasha, where the Attenborough estate lies, by a native messenger, who said that the distinguished hunter appeared to be in good shape.

Commander Attenborough, who is a retired British naval officer, came across Lake Niarasha in his steam launch this morning at full speed, bringing tales of suffering from the Roosevelt camp and procuring a supply of food, and sped back to his estate to relieve the party.

Commander Attenborough, with his brother, H. W. Attenborough, who was for 20 years a resident of San Fransisco invited Colonel Roosevelt and his party to camp on their estate and to shoot in their wonderful game preserve. Especially did they invite Colonel Roosevelt to use their launch in Lake Nairasha in securing a bull hippopotamus, which is lacking from his bag.

Colonel Roosevelt, according to Commander Attenborough, is making toward the estate with all speed.

Commander Attenborough, while the porters were loading his launch this morning with all manner of food and supplies for the Roosevelt party, said that R. J. Cunningham, a noted English hunter, who is in charge of the Roosevelt party, accompanied by a few porters, staggered up to the Attenborough manor house last night. Cunningham was in terrible shape.

When he was rested and had had food and drink, Cunningham told Commander Attenborough that the Roosevelt party had found itself suddenly short of both food and water and that the caravan was coming on to the Attenborough estate. Cunningham had come ahead with extra speed to secure a small amount of water and provision to last the party on its journey.

Cunningham underestimated the distance from the Roosevelt camp and he and his porters started out across the desert without sufficient supplies, with the result that were in bad shape when they reached the estate.

An Enjoyable Hay Ride.

It was impossible to get a report from the party of young people who went from here to Aurora on a hay ride last Wednesday evening, for at the time the paper went to press on Thursday we knew where they had been and that was all. It seems as though the members of the party were not accustomed to losing so much sleep.

They seem to have left here close to 7 p. m., drove to the Lantz House at Aurora where a big supper awaiting them. After that a dance was given and both the Oakland crowd and a few of the 400 of Aurora and vicinity joined hands to make it a grand success. Of course it is understood that all did not dance, for everything was so favorable for sight seeing. Pleasure came to a close early, and the party started for home a little later. Every thing was so favorable that evening, that those who made the trip claim that its something they can't soon forget.

Those on the hay ride were: Misses Josie Robinson, Annie Loewenstein, Mable Porter, Tecla Johnson, Irene Conwell, Vernie Schrock, Orpah Ashby and Alma Scherr; Messrs. Wellington Crane, Allen Justice, Ralph Weber, Harry McComas, "Cotton" White, Roy Hammond, Gordon Mealy and Paul Naylor. It is a mystery with some: Why "Joe" had another date; why Mable couldn't be found; whether Tecla was chaperone; why Irene held on to the blanket; why Vernie was so accommodating; why Orpah didn't want to come home; why Alma went sight seeing; why Crane got so cold; why Justice was so anxious; why Weber got such so close home; why "Dr." lost his coat; why "Cotton" was so restless; why Roy never moved; why Mealy's arm was sore; why Naylor never fell off the wagon; and how Pat could drive with one hand and the mascot draw brakes when asleep. Presented to Bar Association.

Mr. Jacob Brown, the oldest member of the Allegany Bar, and the oldest in length of membership in the history of the local Bar, has presented to the Bar Association of Allegany county, a lithograph portrait of Daniel Webster, which Mr. Brown has had in his possession for forty years. Mr. Brown says it is an excellent likeness of the great statesman as he remembers him, Mr. Brown having seen him when he made an address in Baltimore in behalf of Henry Clay's candidacy for the presidency.—Cumberland News.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT

Thorough and Judicious Advertising Is a Necessary Factor.

Publicity is one of the most effective methods employed by developing communities to secure an increase in population, to induce the establishment in in their midst of large manufacturing interests or companies, to exploit whatever may be the source of income of any particular locality. In fact it might be stated that it is the only method, because, no matter what the inducements might be, they will never be properly and fully utilized unless the story of their existance is told to the busy outside financial world, which is constantly being solicited by other communities having like inducements to offer. Reducing the problem to its lowest possible terms it means that the nations, states, cities or villages requiring development enter in a broad sense into competition with each other toward the capital and labor of the world, who might be likened unto buyers receiving price quotations from every quarter. And, while the seller, enthused by the excellence of his wares, truly believes that his qualities are the best and his prices the lowest, the purchaser has before him in the cold financial centers and marts of trade equally good inducements from others.

Therefore every community must tell its story, and tell it well, because the lack of proper information, compatable to the neglect of a seller to give full prices and discounts, will militate against it. There is no sentiment in finance or trade, and the cards must be laid on the table. Investors will not form companies nor do they buy shares unless they have full information. When the knowledge they must have is not available or incomplete glittering generalities will not arouse their interest and they will most likely invest where, all things being equal, the proper information is available and attractively presented. It gives them confidence, because they feel that in the community that is to be developed there exists a modern spirit of enterprise which augurs well for the success of their venture.—"Peru Today."

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. Address Dr. Percival Lantz, Alaska, W. Va. 7-tf

WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnificent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience: America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,000.00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements. These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and believe that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator is still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

Mayonnaise Dressing.

Take the yolks of two eggs, one-half a teaspoonful of salt, one-half an egg spoonful mustard, and a little white pepper. Mix the yolks and mustard together with a fork, then add olive oil very slowly, not more than a few drops at a time. Keep stirring and adding the oil until the mixture becomes thick and creamy. Add salt, white pepper and malt and tarragon vinegar. More malt than tarragon is used. The vinegar will thin it to the proper consistency. Serve with lettuce, celery, or any kind of salad.

Baltimore Whip.

Grate the rind of two lemons and squeeze out the juice; add two teaspoonfuls of vanilla, one cup of pulverized sugar, two whites of eggs, and the yolks of four. Beat for ten minutes. Dissolve two boxes of gelatin in a cup of warm water; when cool add to other ingredients drop by drop, then fold in the well-beaten whites of four eggs, beating constantly. Turn the mixture into a glass dish, beating constantly. Serve with orange juice sweetened and maraschino syrup.

To Clean Bathtubs.

To clean bathtubs, washbowls, and white sinks, use benzine or gasoline, saturate a rag and rub all over, and then rub dry with another cloth; if they are dirty, repeat. This will save labor and also the porcelain on the tubs and sinks; keep benzine in a glass jar and keep away from fire

FIGHTING ABSINTHE.

Green Cordial Filling Insane Asylums of France.

Aroused finally to the frightful cost of the absinthe habit in lives taken and reason dethroned, the French government has at last given its countenance to a mighty effort to abolish the seductive green liquor from the land.

The issue is now before the parliament, and it is assured that the issue of the fight will be decided in the senate.

When a bill making it a penal offense to sell absinthe in France was introduced into the chamber of deputies it met with instant support and was passed by a big majority. President Fallieres stands only too ready to give his signature to the bill, providing it can be put past the senate. Here a large number of the members are in favor of such a sweeping measure, but a powerful lobby representing the millions invested in French distilleries is opposing to the very limit of its resources the bill which will virtually deal a death blow to the trade.

The importance of the temperance crusade in the United States is mild compared to the absolute necessity for ridding France, and especially Paris, of the curse of absinthe. In fact, public men of that country say it would be a blessing if the workingmen of the republic could be persuaded to turn to the intoxicants used in the United States, such as beer, whisky and wine.

It is argued that whatever ill effects overindulgence in these may have are mild compared to the devastating horrors of the green cordial that saps the brain and in a few years converts a strong, healthy, normal man into a maniac or murderer, or both.

There is nothing in the flavor of absinthe to suggest its deadly properties. Compared to the bite of whisky, for example, it tastes mild, almost insipid.

The flavor that stands out strongly is the anise, which recalls nothing more strongly than the old-fashioned paregoric, with which mothers used to dose children in time of necessity.

But in addition to the anise are other ingredients, alcohol and oil of wormwood standing out especially strong, and it is said that from the oil of wormwood come the deadly traits that have now aroused a frightened nation into a crusade of abolition.

The effect of absinthe is at first lulling. Some of the narcotic power of the drug first exercises its influence. Then comes an exhilaration, an excitement. One glass is nothing; it is only a temptation, an incentive. Seated at his table, oblivious of everything but the green poison before him the victim of the habit pours the seductive drug into his veins. It acts like the draught from the opium smoker's pipe or the sensation from the needle of the morphine user.

But it is said by neurologists that the effect is deadlier because sleep is slower in coming. The poppy taken from the pipe or from the needle induces unconsciousness, but the absinthe drinker goes on from draught to draught until finally he is so completely out of himself that no extreme of crime or abasement daunts him.

In the arguments before the chamber of deputies some astounding facts were produced.

One clever statistician showed that so greatly had the habit increased in the last six years that now the average consumption for each individual is a glass taller than the average Frenchman. He further went on to show that in 1835 the amount of absinthe consumed in France did not amount to one-sixth the total put away annually now, and this in spite of the fact that in all other parts of the world there has been a gradual reaction against all forms of alcoholic overindulgence.

France, it was shown, now consumed more absinthe than all the remainder of the world put together, and Paris more than the remainder of Europe with the remainder of France excluded.

The great problem of race suicide, which in France has become a matter of keenest concern, it is said, is one of the direct results of the national abuse of absinthe.

It is no exaggeration to say that in Paris a huge section of the population lives for absinthe alone.

All classes are victims to the habit, the wealthy clubman no less than the poor artisan.

Thousands of dens for the sale of absinthe fill all parts of the city.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

THEIR ELOPEMENT FOILED

Youthful Lovers Journey to Oakland Only To Meet With Disappointment.

Last Wednesday Bert Snyder and Miss Martha Donley crossed the Monongehela River at Morgantown just as the day was breaking, leaving behind them at Mount Morris their homes and set their faces joyously in the direction of Oakland, the Gretna Green of lovers on matrimony bent throughout the section of Morgantown, but the day's experience was full of disappointment, and before reaching the homes they had left so blithely and gay the day preceding they were convinced that if all the cold, cruel world loves a lover, the said world has a poor way of showing it sometimes.

We shall let the Morgantown Dominion of Thursday tell the remainder of the tale in the following paragraphs:

"The young lady is barely passed the middle 'teens, and her worshipper is perhaps a little older, but he scarcely looks it. In spite of youthfulness, the young people, convinced that they know where happiness lies, slipped away from their homes yesterday morning early, drove to Morgantown, and boarded the early train over the M. & K. for Rowlesburg, where they caught a B. & O. passenger for Oakland. Meantime, their absence had created a stir in the Mount Morris home, and the telegraph and telephone lines had been busy. When the youthful runaways reached the Maryland town, they found information as to their ages in advance of them, and the coveted marriage license was refused. The officers were kind, but firm, and insisted that the young folks must remain there until the young lady's brother or her guardian appeared. However, upon the promise that they would go right straight home, without a pause, and without turning to the right or the left, the mayor allowed them to board a train for Rowlesburg. They caught the M. & K. train due here at 6:29 and came to Morgantown. After a supper which was eaten in silence, a team and driver was secured, and the drive homeward begun. On the way, the runaways were met by the young lady's brother, who acted as a personal escort during a part of the return journey.

"Local officers were asked to assist in stopping the proposed wedding but their services were not necessary, as the ceremony had been abandoned for good when the difficulty at Oakland was encountered."

Fatally Injured While Digging Grave.

While digging the grave of W. H. Werder, an aged resident of Grafton, who died on Monday, Thomas E. Stillwell was possibly fatally injured. Rocky soil necessitated a blast, but before Stillwell could reach safety, the explosion occurred, fracturing his skull and otherwise wounding him. He is in the Grafton hospital in a precarious condition.

GAS WILL BE TURNED ON AUGUST FIRST

Work of Installing Mains in Oakland Completed Last Saturday Afternoon.

Last Saturday at three minutes before six o'clock the work of installing the gas mains under the streets of Oakland was completed by the small army of men which has been engaged in that capacity during the past several weeks and on Monday the majority of them went to Terra Alta, where the installation of mains was begun under the supervision of Mr. J. B. Cheuvront, the local superintendent.

By Saturday or possibly tomorrow afternoon connection will be made at the outskirts of Oakland with the trunk line which is nearing completion from the West Virginia border near Gorman and on Saturday night of next week a public exhibition of the possibilities of natural gas as an illuminant will be made at a point yet to be selected by the gas company's officials, but somewhere within the limits of the town. For this purpose a standpipe of large dimensions will be connected with the main and the gas turned on and lighted. The probabilities are that the flame which will leap from the open end of the pipe which is to extend into the air at an elevation of thirty or forty feet above the street level, may be seen for miles around, so all eyes to witness the sight should be directed toward Oakland that evening. The hour will be eight-thirty o'clock when the gas is to be lighted and it will be kept burning for thirty minutes, probably longer.

For this occasion the gas company's superintendent, Mr. Cheuvront, is having a thousand invitations printed at this office which will be mailed to the people generally in the county and the near-by towns, so that if all avail themselves of the opportunity and come to Oakland that evening a fairly good sized crowd will be present.

Following the exhibition gas will be turned into the homes and business houses of consumers Sunday, August 1st.

To Test Two-Cent Law.

The third suit to test the West Virginia two-cent law, was filed in the Kanawha Circuit Court at Charleston, when the Virginian Railway asked for an injunction to restrain the Attorney General and the prosecuting attorneys of the counties through which the railroad operates, from enforcing the law against that road. The case will be heard July 24. In similar cases brought by the Coal and Coke and the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Companies, Judge Burdett has held the law unconstitutional and void.

CANDIDATE GREEN'S RECORD

What He "Stands" For and What He Has Done.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Two weeks ago the attention of the writer was directed to a long-drawn out appeal by one signing himself L. F. Green, addressed to the people of Garrett county, asking for their support of his candidacy for the House of Delegates, and in the communication which appeared simultaneously in THE REPUBLICAN and also in the Journal Mr. Green laid down the platform upon which he stands and by which he expects to draw the support of the Republican voters of Garrett county in the convention or at the primaries, which ever mode of making the nominations the committee may select or decide to have. Mr. Green's appeal is not to made to the Republicans, but to the people of the county, hence I am led to believe that Mr. Green has little faith in the party he fondly hopes to be nominated by, and by the language of his platform one is led to believe that he is not a Republican at all, but a Prohibitionist, for in the appeal for support he does not ask as a man representing the Republican party, but as one who is an out and out prohibitionist, representing no fixed principles of government—nothing of a nature that would lead one to believe he is a true Republican, but one who desires to ride into office by hook or crook—just so he gets there.

Up to the time Mr. Green issued his dictum nothing appeared, nor had anything ever been hinted, concerning temperance legislation except by the Anti-Saloon League of Baltimore city, which organization, through Mr. Green and some other raw legislators at Annapolis, forced upon the people of Oakland the present odoriferous law which prevent them from saying whether or not liquor shall be sold in the town, and by the same act legislated liquor out of Accident, giving Mr. Miller, at the distillery, the sole right to sell it in that section, and this without a vote of the people affected. Still Mr. Green has the effrontery to come before the people of Garrett county and state that he is a believer in the great principle of local self-government and is willing to give the voters the right by wards, districts, etc., to say whether or not liquor shall be sold therein. Truly Mr. Green has experienced a great change of heart since the last session of the Legislature, and taking a retrospective view, one of discerning and enquiring mind is led to believe that Mr. Green is somewhat of a political gymnast and really does not know what he does stand for—except to get the office.

Mr. Green pledges himself in his platform not to swerve from his duty as he "sees it." See what, may I ask? Some are "seen" one way; some another!

In the language of his platform of principles Mr. Green is a great exponent of a fair primary election law. If the writer's memory serves him aright Mr. Green, when he was nominated two years ago for the House of Delegates, was pledged by the nominationg convention to enact a primary election law for Garrett county, drawn upon the lines of the Crawford county system. After the election and upon taking his seat at Annapolis this pledge evidently passed from Mr. Green's mind for no such law was either framed or enacted for the people of Garrett county. Now comes Mr. Green, on the eve of another nominating convention, pledging himself to the enactment of such a law, when in the face of facts he has broken the pledge which he was in honor bound to perform, and states that the present State law is both "expensive and unintelligible." On page 1291 of the Journal of the House of Delegates for 1908 Mr. Green is recorded as having voted for the passage of the law he now condemns as "expensive and unintelligible." Mr. Green's record as a legislator and Mr. Green's platform of principles as a candidate for renomination, are preposterously harmonious, are they not?

Mr. Green, as has been surmised for the past year, is as wax in the hands of these opposing the Republicans. Here he brings to the surface the influence which controls his every movement. The Garrett Journal, always Mr. Green's staunch supporter and a guiding factor in his every movement, suggested, and Mr. Green followed the suggestion, no doubt, when in his platform he howls for a reduction of the printing expenses of the county, declaring that too much of the peoples' money is being wasted on this item. The press in one of the greatest factors in the development of the country and whatever pittance may be handed out to the newspapers by the public officials is an investment that will bring double returns. But none of this money which Mr. Green declares has been and is being wasted, ever came from Mr. Green's pocketbook, I assure your readers, for his name does not now, nor ever has appeared, upon the tax books of the county as a taxpayer in the sum of even one penny, still he brays like a donkey at the waste of the people's money. It reminds one of the pearls before swine, so Mr. Green's heartache for the poor down trodden taxpaver in this respect is born of a desire to create votes for Mr. Green.

Mr. Green, in his platform of principles, states that he stands "firmly for the untrammeled rights of all citizens, irrespective of party, and opposed to infringements upon their liberty and rights of suffrage by the present unfair registration and election laws, and the proposed Constitutional amendment."

Now comes the most damning record of Mr. Green's short public career of three months at Annapolis. He was sent there presumably as a representative of the people of Garrett county, or a majority of them at least, and this majority being overwhelmingly Republican, Mr. Green's first duty was to look after their interests. How he fulfilled his promise and his duty to his constituents is told in the following:

Turning to page 1353 of the Journal of the House of Delegates I find Mr. Green's vote recorded as having been cast for the passage of "An Act to fix the qualifications of voters at municipal elections in the city of Annapolis, and to provide for the registration of said voters." This law is in effect the same as the proposed Constitutional amendment, and by it at the registration of voters conducted a few weeks ago in Annapolis nearly a thousand Republican residents of that city were denied their rights, and refused registration under the grandfather's clause of the act, which law Mr. Green voted for, and by thus keeping the names of this number of Republicans from the registration lists every Democratic candidate in the city was elected no later than last Tuesday by majorities ranging from 215 to 350.

Mr. Green's assertion that he is opposed to the proposed Constitutional amendment is not borne out by his record as a member of the last House. For years the Democrats have been trying to so amend the Constitution of the State that thousands of Republicans would be disfranchised and upon this question the fight has been made to the exclusion of other important matters of State government. Mr. Green, by his vote for the Annapolis measure, aided the enemies of the party he wants so badly to misrepresent in the next House of Delegates, but he is still opposed to the curtailment of the privileges of the ballot! Forsooth, his record gives this assertion the lie direct!

So much for Mr. Green's public record.

Now for a brief paragraph touching upon the late presidential campaign. During that period last fall a series of articles appeared in the Democratic Journal attacking Mr. Taft's religious views. At the time Mr. Green was openly accused of being the author of these articles but he would neither deny nor affirm their authorship. He was invited, after an exposure was made of his duplicity in the matter by a Pennsylvania newspaper, to state over his own signature in THE REPUBLICAN whether or not he wrote the articles, and in his reply he was evasive, which firmly fixed in the minds of the Garrett county people that Mr. Green was the author of these articles and they are still of this opinion. Will Mr. Green come out and in a manly manner define his position with respect to his votes on the local laws passed by the last Legislature, and also not evade this direct, pointed question: Did you or did you not write the anti-Taft articles appearing in the Journal last fall and signed Republican?.

A TRUE BLUE REPUBLICAN.

Friendsville, July 19, 1909

For State Senator.

Mr. Harvey J. Speicher, of Accident, by advertisement published in today's Republican, makes announcement of his candidacy for the office of State Senator from Garrett county. Mr. Speicher for the past two years has been a member of the County Republican Committee and has been an earnest supporter of the principles of his party ever since he has been of voting age. In business matters Mr. Speicher is energetic, ambitious and has made a tremendous success. He is engaged in agriculture at his home near Accident, where he is the owner of a beautiful farm, and also is in the stock importing business. He was born and reared near Accident, his present home, where his friends are legion. Should he receive the endorsement of his party at the convention Mr. Speicher will be triumphantly elected and at Annapolis will look after the best interests of his constituents conscientiously and well.

THE STATE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY MEETING

Program As Arranged for Gathering at Mt. Lake Park.

The following announcement for the summer meeting of the State Horticultural Society has been sent out by the secretary:

The summer meeting of the Society will be held at Mountain Lake Park, July 30th to August 2nd. The object of going to Western Maryland is to give the members from other sections of the State an opportunity to see the horticultural possibilities of the mountains and to enthuse the residents of the mountainous sections into increased efforts in fruit production. Furthermore, Mountain Lake Park is noted for its cool, pleasant, and healthful climate, and a few days there will be invigorating to persons from from other parts of the State. A meeting at that point will be a compliment to President Brown, whose home is only a few miles distant. The Society has never before held a meeting in Western Maryland.

The most attractive horticultural features near the place of meeting are the extensive greenhouses and vegetable grounds of H. Weber & Sons of Oakland, about one mile distant. These gentlemen are especially noted for their choice productions of cauliflower, carnations and chrysanthemums. They have extended an invitation for the members to visit their grounds and equipment.

The Mountain Lake Park Association, through its manager, Mr. W. W. Davis, has extended a cordial invitatiou to our Society, and will do all in its power to make the visit an enjoyable one to the members.

Arrangements have been made to stop off at Keyser to visit some of the large commercial orchards in that vicinity. To do this involves an extra expense of sixty cents in railroad fare. In any case, however, week end excursion tickets should be purchased through to Mountain Lake Park. Those stopping at Keyser must leave Baltimore on the 8:00 a. m. train, July 30th.

The program is as follows:

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 8:00 A. M.

Invocation — Rev. John M. Davis, Oakland.
Address of Welcome, (For Mountain Lake Park Association), W. W. Davis.
Address of Welcome, (For the Horticultural Society), President W. McCulloh Brown.
Response, Vice-President Richard Vincent, Jr.
Mountain Orcharding, Mr. S. W. Moore, Elwell, W. Va., President of the West Virginia State Horticultural Society.
The Use of Fruit in the Household. Mrs. H. J. Patterson, College Park.

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 2:00 P. M.

The Pure Food Laws as Affecting Fruit Products. Dr. W. W. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the United States Department of Agriculture.
Success in Growing and Marketing Fruit. Mr. S. L. Lupton, Winchester, Va., Member of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. (Mr. Lupton's apple crop, this year, is estimated at 4000 barrels.)

SATURDAY, JULY 31, 8:30 P. M.

Government Cooperative Work in Handling Fruit, illustrated. Mr. W. Taylor, Assistant Pomologist of the United States Department of Agriculture.
(As a result of this cooperative work the California fruit growers saved $2,000,000 during the last year.)

The premium list cannot be printed until the revised list is adopted by the Executive Board, which will not meet until the time of the summer meeting.

LEE McCOMAS PARALYZED

Youngest Son of Dr. J. Lee McComas Seriously Ill in Baltimore.

Monday afternoon Dr. J. Lee McComas, of Oakland, received a long-distance telephone message from the University Hospital in Baltimore acquainting him with the fact that his youngest son, J. Lee McComas, Jr., a resident of Baltimore where he has been making his home for a number of years, had been paralyzed and was a patient in the hospital.

Later advices from the hospital state that Mr. McComas' entire left side was affected and that his condition s extremely grave.

Additional Road Equipment.

Tuesday Mr. J. E. Francis, the State road contractor, received from the Farquhar works at York, Pa., a new combination road roller and traction engine which will be put into commission on the road today or tomorrow. The new engine is equipped with double cylinders and is rated at forty horse power and capable of hauling from fifty to seventy tons over the roads having the greatest percentage of grade. With the new engine Mr. Francis now has two traction and three road rollers. He has graded about two thousand feet of the roadway and will begin placing the foundation rock upon it in a day or two.

THE MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK ORATORICAL CONTEST

Garrett Countains Should Take More Interest in the Matter.

A new form of entertainment at Mountain Lake Park has been announced for August 2nd, which should especially interest every college student of Garrett county. It is an oratorical contest in which only college students are allowed to participate. A beautiful gold medal, costing $25 will be awarded to the best orator of the evening. The contest is open to students of any state, and already six men and one woman have signified their willingness to enter. It is noticeable, however, that only one is from Garrett county, Mr. C. Edward Bender, of Grantsville. One would naturally suppose that the greatest number would be from this county. Students are coming from Moundsville, Buckhannon, and other distant places at considerable expense, and feel that the opportunity of entering such a contest fully justifies them. Men and women of this county have the same advantage virtually without any expense. Garrett is gradually raising the standard of her public schools, and increasing the interest in higher education. Boys and girls leave the county each year for college training, and many of them return to teach in the public and high schools. The contest at Mountain Lake should show where these students are and what they are worth. Not only should a number enter the contest, but every college student of the county should be present to cheer for their colleges and universities, and to show that old Garrett is not lacking in genuine college spirit. Those who wish to enter the contest must send before July 31st their name and titles, with copy, of their oration, to Dr. W. W. Davis, Mountain Lake Park, Md. Dr. Victor E. Albright, who is spending the Summer at the Park, has consented to give, at a nominal rate one or more private rehearsals to those contestants who desire a few suggestions and directions on the composition and delivery of their orations.

In Defense of the Weather.

Don't blame the weather! It's your own fault if you are limp, feverish and disgusted. It's your own fault if you groan and perspire. The weather itself is all right. It is mellow, moist and magnificent. The same sort of weather, indeed, made life one grand, sweet song in the Garden of Eden.

But Adam and Eve, of course, were properly appreciative and receptive, which we of today are not. Instead of celluloid cuffs and hard, stiff straw hats, Adam wore only a peach kernel around his neck to ward of sciatica. Instead of hot, mattress-like rats, a peach basket hat and a jungle of false frizzes, Eve wore only the smile that wouldn't come off. In consequences, they enjoyed the weather. On gorgeous days they reclined beneath their spreading fig tree, singing duets, reading the best sellers and enjoying the balmy air. No one overheard Adam complain of the weather. He thought it was perfect—and he was right.

If we wore less clothing on these hot days we would more nearly approach Adam's point of view.

In simpler times men had more good sense. Socrates, the great philosopher, never saw a velvet waistcoat or a derby hat in all his life. Inhabiting a warm country, he garbed himself appropriately. At his office his customary vestment consisted of a large sheet of polka-dotted madras which was wrapped around him twice. On Sundays he added a pair of knit hose and a boutonniere. The other dignitaries of his day followed suit. The uniform of the chief of police of Athens was a large square of muslin, with a hole in the center. He stuck his head through tne hole, gathered in the muslin at the waist, fastened it with a nail—and was ready for work.

We do not advocate a literal following out of these precedents, but it is plain that some general reforms must come before there can be any cessation of the bitter and altogether unjustifiable denunciation of the weather which now goes on. The weather, as we pointed out in the beginning, is all right; it is precisely what it ought to be for this season of the year, and is prepared by nature according to her most ancient and orthodox formulas. The trouble is with ourselves in becoming denatured. But whether we like it or not, nature will continue to do business at the old stand and in the old fashion without regard to our protests. And this being the good old summer time, and only about the middle of July, the only consolation we can offer is contained in the familiar admonition, "Cheer up! The worst is yet to come."

COST OF POOR ROADS

Waste of Labor in Hauling Crops to Markets.

It cost a little over a billion dollars to haul the farm crops of America to markets last year. With good roads, roads such as are to be found in some parts of America and in all parts of France, the marketing of the crops would have cost $400,000,000. Six hundred millions dollars per year, then, is the price we pay in this land of the free for having impassable roads, says a writer in the St. Louis Times. Did ever a nation spend so much for so doubtful a luxury before? With American roads lying open and fathomless before the eyes of our foreign critics, what monstrous injustice it is to talk of American dollar worship!

Most men of middle age can recall the annual picnic known as mending the roads. Just why it got that name no one has ever explained, for in practically every case the picnic left the roads in worse condition than before. The law in many states prescribe that each resident of a rural district must pay a certain road tax in labor each year. The payment of this tax was done under the supervision of a local officer, known as the pathmaster. The customary time of payment was in the early summer, just before haying time, when there wasn't much else for the men and teams to do. The neighborhood turned out with horses and plows and harrows, ripped up diverse sections of highways which the year's travel had packed to a more of less navigable condition, rounded them up nicely in the middle and scratched them up smooth with the harrows. You were never expected to work very hard at these festive occasions, and the pathmaster who insisted on real work soon found himself very unpopular. It was just as well, for, since nobody had any knowledge of road making, the more work the worse results.

What some of these results were and are we have vivid testimony. Across Iowa last winter the "racing" autos had to take to the railroad tracks because the common roads were simply impassable. Last March some misguided creatures began an automobile race from New York to Savannah, Ga. It was just at the opening of navigation on the country roads of the middle south, the time when the roads are too thin for wheels and too thick for boats. Across Virginia each racing automobile had an escort of six mules to pull it out of extra deep mudholes and to haul its emergency rations of gasoline. Ususally this was enough, but when an auto was so thoughtless as to stay in the mudhole all night the mule teams had to be doubled and all the negroes of the neighborhood commandeered to service before that particular contestant could proceed. The racers averaged four miles per hour across the Old Dominion—a perfectly stunning rate of speed, all things considered.

And yet the roads of America are vastly better than they once were, and the improvement is going one apace. The United States government is lending a hand by setting its spare scientists to work teaching the people of different regions how to make the best roads at the least cost. The states are doing vastly more. New York in 1905 voted to spend $50,000,000 on her highways, and, while no other is investing in roads at that rate, all are doing something.

Cities are finding it good business to improve the roads leading out into the farming region, the farmers are beginning to tax themselves in a rational fashion for highway improvement, and conventional college and library donation to spend their surplus funds on good roads. Historic mudholes are being slowly filled up, stone and concrete are replacing the crazy wooden bridges, and a hundred inventions have been made to help get the best results for the lowest expense.

Some of the last deserve attention. Macadam roads have long been accepted as the standard of highway construction But macadam roads of the old pattern, with crushed stone eight inches thick, cost from $6,000 to $10,000 per mile. Now it has been found that three or four inches will do quite well, and the cost is cut squarely in two. In some parts of the central states, where crushed stone is rare, it has been found that the very clay which makes the roads almost impassable is the best trackmaking material when burned. In yet other regions the farmers have discovered how to make good roads by the simple of rolling or dragging them after each rain. and yet in other places a mixture of sand and clay, costing $300 or $400 a mile, is found almost as good as the best macadam.

It is well that the roadmaking materials are abundant and varied. for there are roads enough in the United States to reach eighty-six times around the earth at the equator, and nearly all those are bad. The advocate of good highways will find ample room for their missionary enterprises for a generation to come.

HER ANCESTOR WAS WITH GENERAL BRADDOCK

Inmate of County Home is Great-Granddaughter of Jos. Fausett.

It is not generally known that one of the inmates of our county home is Miss Rebecca Fausett who is now over 80 years of age. Miss Fausett is a great-grand daughter of Joseph Fausett who served under General Braddock and was in the disastrous defeat of July 9, 1775. It will be remembered that General Braddock knocked down several of the provincial troops for treeing in that engagement and demanded that they stand out in the open and fight in true English style, thus showing his ignorance of Indian warfare.

When Tom Fausett saw the enraged general strike down his brother for no other offense than fighting in the only successful way against the Indian and the terrible slaughter of the "poor Virginia Blues," as he termed the provincials, he fired the shot that stopped the battle and saved what was saved of Braddock's army, and the immortal Washington to the future service of his country.

Aunt Rebecca Fausett, as she is familiarly called, spent all her former life in our mountains and has been a hard worker all these years, and for much of her service she has received no compensation. It is very affecting to hear her relate how she has toiled all her life and at last must spend her declining days as an object of charity. She complains most piteously, as tears course their way down her furrowed cheeks, of being compelled to spend her days away from the scenes she loves so well in our beautiful mountains.

She speaks in the highest terms of the treatment she receives at the county home, Stewart Dean and his excellent wife are doing all within their power to make her comfortable, but her longing for the scenes of her early life and the thought of being obliged to live at the county home as an object of charity, show a spirit deserving of a better fate.

She has a small fund laid by sufficient to secure her a respectable burial, and it would be a most commendable act if a few of our citizens who have ample means would see that she be secured a comfortable home with some worthy mountain family near the scenes of her former life where she might spend her declining days in comfort and contentment. —Uniontown Standard.

Modern Fashions.

Fashions are so peculiar that it's a real treat for a woman to be unlovely and comfortable.

JASPER AUGUSTINE IS BIG FARMER

Has 2000 Acres and Is Agriculturist on Very Large Scale.

It is claimed that Jasper Augustine is the most extensive farmer in the state of Pennsylvania, that he cultivates a larger acreage and employs more men than any other. At any rate there is no agriculturist in this part of the state who farms on such a scale and does it so thoroughly and successfully.

Mr. Augustine has a tract of 2000 acres of valuable land which lies around Addison, mostly in Somerset county, but a strip of about 400 acres stretches over into Maryland. He has under cultivation 1200 acres of fertile soil and his fields range from 16 to 83 acres in size.

Large herds of cattle graze in his pastures, vast fields of growing corn give promise of rich harvest this fall and acres and acres of meadows stretch out in a waving sea of grass.

There are between 300 and 400 acres in wheat and oats which is headed nicely and ripening fast so that the wheat will be ready to cut next week. There is one field of 26 acres of buckwheat and another of 16 acres. Mr. Augustine supplies the entire surrounding country with buckwheat and many a family enjovs the pure buckwheat cakes in the winter which come from the product he raises on his farm.

This year Mr. Augustine has between 350 and 400 acres in meadow. He started to cut the grass Monday and three mowers cut a 16 acre field in four hours. Last year he had 250 to 300 acres in meadow which turned out between 450 and 500 tons of hay, but owing to the severe drought of last fall the crop this year will not be half that of last year although the acreage in grass is considerably larger. Instead of having long ricks it is Mr. Augustine's plan to put the hay in small stacks where it dries out better after rains and prevents heating and rotting.

There are many fields of corn which range in size from 16 to 83 acres. The farm is equipped with all modern machinery and there are three cultivators at work in this large 83 acre field all the time. There will be a bumper corn crop on this farm, one that would do justice to some of the large western farms.

One of the big meadows consists of 75 acres and some of the grass is 5 feet, 7 inches high, towering far above the buggy wheels when one drives into it. When there is a slight breeze the grass rises and falls in waves like the billows of the ocean.

In the Maryland part of the farm are four hundred acres in blue grass where there are between 400 and 500 cattle grazing nearly all the time. Mr. Augustine is an extensive cattle raiser and his stock is greatly in demand and farmers come there from Fayette, Somerset, Greene and other counties to look over his herds and buy choice stock to add to their herds.

Nineteen men are employed on the farm the year round and 60 to 75 in harvest time. Jasper's son John is general superintendent, but Jasper is there during the summer season and well into the fall and has every detail well in hand and is a hard worker himself, being in the field at 6 o'clock in the morning and laboring hard until darkness comes on at night.

Everything about the farm is kept in the most perfect order. All of the fields are enclosed in fences which are repaired and painted and white-washed every spring and carefully kept throughout the season. Everything about the place is kept neat and clean and the farm is a model of scientific methods in agriculture.

In addition to looking after his busy harvest Mr. Augustine is preparing for his annual picnic which will be bigger and better than ever this year. It will be held probably some day between the 8th and 15th of August and a number of the most prominent citizens of Uniontown will be there to make addresses.—Uniontown Standard.

WILL CELEBRATE NATIONAL ROAD

Movement Started in Indiana and Prominent Lady is Promoter.

A movement for a national celbration in honor of the historic National Road has been started and announcement concerning the plans has been received by Postmaster W. W. Greene, of Uniontown, Pa., from Mrs. Ella Hartwig Kalley, of Indianapolis, Ind., who says that Governor Thomas Marshall, of Indiana has been petitioned to lend his assistance. She says also:

"We have written letters to some of the firms in Uniontown and elsewhere whose names are given in Searight's "History of the Old Pike," but on account of many deaths and change of addresses we are finding it hard to get in communication with the old patrons of the road. We will therefore be grateful to you or any other person who can assist us in in finding the proper persons, as we hope to have delegates representing every mile of the road.

"On account of the Hudson-Fulton celebration in New York in September our celebration will probably not take place until 1910 and even if deferred until next year there is a vast amount of work for the entire intervening period.

"It may interest many people in your city to learn of this movement and with that in mind I am advised as a promoter to invite your co-operation. As I was born on the line of the road in Illinois and have loved the great highway all my life, I need not tell of my great interest in the present movement."

Mrs. Kalley is an author, lecturer, traveler, and editor of the National Missionary. She is also the founder and president of the Hartwig Kalley Assembly for Aged People which is accessible to respectable aged or incurables of either sex from any state in the union, and in the last 10 years nearly 400 have been cared for.

Mrs. Kalley is without doubt a woman who does things and she has now started earnestly as promoter of plans to celebrate the national road. Anyone wishing to write her may address, her at 3548 East Washington street, Indianapolis, Ind.

MADE WITH APPLES

THREE DISHES THAT ARE ALWAYS SEASONABLE.

Apple Ginger Not Hard to Prepare, and Will Remain Good a Long Time—Recipe for Butter and Jelly.

Apple Ginger—Two pounds of any kind of hard apples, two pounds of loaf sugar, one and one-half pints of water, one ounce of tincture of ginger. Boil the sugar and water until they form a rich sirup, adding the ginger when it boils up. Pare, core and cut the apples into pieces; dip them in cold water to preserve the color, and boil them in the sirup until transparent, but be careful not to let them break. Put the pieces of apple into jars, pour over the sirup and carefully exclude the air by well covering them. It will remain good for some time if kept in a dry place.

Apple Butter—Boil one barrel of new cider down half, peel and core three bushels of good cooking apples; when the cider has boiled to half the quantity add the apples and when soft stir constantly for from eight to ten hours. If done it will adhere to an inverted plate. Put away in stone jars (not earthenware) covering first with writing paper cut to fit the jar, and press down closely upon the apple butter; cover the whole with thick brown paper snugly tied down.

Apple Jelly—Apples, water; to every pint of sirup allow three-quarters of a pound of loaf sugar. Pare and cut the apples into pieces, remove the cores and put them in a preserving pan with sufficient cold water to cover them. Let them boil for an hour; then drain the sirup from them through a hair sieve or jelly bag and measure the juice; to every pint allow three-quarters of a pound of loaf sugar and boil these together for three-quarters of an hour, skimming every particle off same as it rises and keeping the jelly well stirred, that it may not burn. A little lemon rind may be boiled with the apples and a small quantity of strained lemon juice may be put in the jelly just before it is done, when the flavor is liked. It should be stored away in small pots.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY

The True Christmas.

Oh, the Christmas that is truest
Is the Christmas in the cot,
In the dwelling of the humble
Hid in some sequestered spot,
In the home where mother's fingers
In the evenings crisp and clear
Have with tender love and patience
Toiled to bring the Christmas cheer.

Yes, the tree is just a hemlock
Gathered from yon distant hill
And the presents all are simple
That its bristling branches fill.
Ah, the popcorn strings she threaded,
And the mittens that she made,
And the apples she selected
In her earnest Christmas raid!

Oh, her purse was scant and meager,
But her love was boundless wide!
Ah, the many resignations
And the things for self denied!
Now, behold, the whole is finished
And the children shout with glee
In the cottage of the toiler
'Round that home-made Christmas tree!

Wealth may stand aside with yearning,
Castles long to feel the thrill
All triumphant in the cottage
Of the humble by the mill,
For the sweetest Christmas people,
And the one that cannot fade,
Is the one where love is reigning,
Is the one that mother made!

What Shakespeare Did.

Once upon a time Henry Irving and Toole, the comedian, visited the home of Shakespeare. They wandered about the sacred and classic scenes by the Avon and imbibed something of the spirit of Stratford. On their way to the hotel, after leaving the historic place, they met an agricultural laborer coming home with pantaloons in boots, a bit of shirt sticking from his trousers' top and a pipe in his mouth. He was stolid and content. Toole asked him:

"Does Mr. Shakespeare live here?"

"No, sir; he be dead."

"Well, do many people come to see his grave?"

"Oh, yes, sor."

"What did he do to make these great crowds visit the house and the church where he is buried?"

"I've lived 'ere all my life," said the fellow, scratching his head in great perplexity, "and I don't know—but I think he writ somethin'!"

Something Doing.

Did you ever hear anything to equal the ignorance of city people? Some of them are wondering what people do for excitement in the country districts. Just think of that. Didn't we have a presidential election in Argyle this week? Hasn't Dave Covey been talking politics all summer? Didn't you see Doc Larson here from Blanchardville with his automobile? Hasn't the barber shop been newly papered? Didn't we have two Hallowe'en parties in town Saturday night? Hasn't Frank Thompson got a new Poland China cow with a calico calf? Don't we have the streets lighted every moonlight night? Isn't the game warden here nearly every week? Wasn't the train on time one day? Hasn't the railroad company put a refrigerator car on the fast mail train? Don't talk to us about excitement—there is something doing in Argyle every week or two.—Argyle (Wis.) Atlas.

HER NAME NOT POLLY TICKS.

During the late campaign an Illinois candidate for the legislature was driving through the country, seeking votes among the farmers, when he met a young man in farmer's garb, walking by the roadside.

Having in mind a prospective vote, he stopped his horse, and saluting him in a familiar manner, inquired:

"Are you paying any attention to politics nowadays?"

The young man stopped, looked at him suspiciously, and drawled out:

"No, stranger; that don't happen to be my gal's name; but ef it was I wouldn't think it was any of yo durned business."

This ended the interview, as well as the prospect.—Judge.

BRAVE CAPTAIN CONQUERED HIS "TAME PIRATE" CREW

For Nine Days Commander Fought His way Up Coast With Dismantled Schooner.

New York, July 14.—The is a sea story of the olden time. It has a wreck, and mutinous crew and a murderous Portugee. The hero is a captain who brought his dismantled schooner into port practically alone against a squad of what he calls "tame pirates." For a fortnight he didn't have any sleep to speak of becanse the danger of not waking up was extreme. During that time he didn't turn his back on his men, "because there ain't no use in placing temptation in a man's way." And for all that he doesn't bear any malace against his men.

"They was just scared," he says, philosophically. "They'd a killed me, or done anything else, to get off the schooner. But I knew I could bring her in, and I made 'em stay. No, I did't use a gun. Not even my fists. I just bossed 'em, that's all. The mate—who was the only one that stuck to me—he had to pull a gun sometimes. But they never wanted to tackle me when I was lookin' at 'em."

Capt. Bill Derrickson, of the schooner Ann S. Trainer, is a husky individual, red-cheeked and thick handed. For nine days he fought his way up the coast with a dismasted vessel, battling against huge seas. His crew was hysterical, his ship unmanageable, his deck load of lumber washed about until it tore the rigging loose. But those things did blame a lot of shiverin' negroes and scart Portugese for not wantin' to risk their lives for $25 a month," said he, "but they signed on with me to work, and by gum, they had to do it."

A general alarm was sent out by wireless the other day, asking all vessels to watch out for the Trainer, lying dismasted in the coastwise path. But a few hours later she came came more or less blightly into port at the end of a long steel hawser, with a tug yanking at her. "Naw, we wasn't salvage," said Capt. Bill. "We could a-been salvaged long before. But that would a-cost thousands of dollars. As it was, we just had a tug haul us in as usual, and fer the usual fee."

The rest of the story, as Capt. Bill told it, is to be taken with the provision that it is not too complete on names and dates. "I've got all them things writ down in the log," he said, in explanation, "but I don't rightly remember all of 'em in my head—not even the name of that big yeller Portugese, or steamer that sighted us and refused to take us in tow, without I give 'em a guarantee of $7,500 for the job. And he called himself a sailorman! I'd say he was a shark. We was off Barnagat, when the wind began to blow up strong from the east. We started to tack, and bore off and on, all the time the wind strengthnin' until at last, I decided to tack back to Delaware Breakwater. By that time it was comin' somethin' awful, with a heavy sea runnin', and the deckload started. We carried dressed planks, and you known when they get wet they are mighty slippery.

The deck waren't a pleasant place with them ples of planks bangin' around your legs, and things looked more serious when they commenced to pound the riggin'. Mauled the way the Trainer was by the seas, there wasn't no chance for the riggin' to stand the strain of the lumber againt it, and strand by strand it give. I saw what was comin', but could't do nothin'. What was there to do?

"Pretty soon all the stays on the main and mizzen was busted, and fust thing you know, she wallowed so they snapped off clean at the deck and went over the side. With the weight all on our starboard side we heeled over on our beam ends and it took some lively work to get us up again. She was jumpin' so I was afraid the fore would go, but that stayed through it all. I saw it wouldn't do to let her lie around like she was—any fool 'ud know that—and I rigged up an old jib I had and a foresail, enough to give her steerageway, with one gaff and a sheet runnin' back to the stump of the mizzen.

"Now, the weather had veered round and it was a dead calm. We wasn't in any danger, 'cause not a seam had started in the Trainer's hull, though the shifting deckload had smashed her up above. We had shipped a good deal of water, it is true, but all came in by way of the deck. And we had plenty of fresh water and grub, so I wasn't worryin'. But that crew! There was five, three Virginia blacks and two Portugese, and they were scared stiff. A Portugese, a big yellow fellow, was the ring leader, and he wanted 'em to take to the boat or knife me.

"Well, they couldn't take to boats, 'cause the only one left was a flat-bottomed shiff that had been stove up by some of the waves which walloped us. And they didn't quite have the spunk to knife me, and, besides I had the mate, a decent young feller, named Clayton, and the cook, Cambridge. Cambridge stood by me almost to the end; then he went over to the others.

"They come to me and they whined. I pointed out to 'em that we was makin' good headway. Havin' no main and mizzen, naturally we couldn't tack, and for that reason I had to stand out from the shore, but with a betam wind we made good time. Finally, I allowed them to put the color in the riggin' upside down, on condition that they would stand by. They said they would, but a lot they meant by it. Long about this time, two days after we was dismasted, I should judge, jest when it began to breath up again, we met a steamer that consented to take us in tow. They ran out a big steel cable abroad and took us along, ten knots an hour. But the wind was a-freshin' all the time and the seas jumpin', and fust thing you know the cable parted.

"They came about and stood by us and hollered to know if we wanted to be taken off. I said no, but all the crew was linin' the rail, yellin' and prayin' and beggin' for a boat. Whether they could hear my men or not, I don't know. I'm glad they didn't take any notice of 'em, 'cause I wouldn't have allowed 'em to leave, anyway, but it's my private impression they wasn't anxious to launch a small boat in that sea. Not that I blame 'em for it. But I don't think they did. So they signaled that they'd send us a tug and stood off on their course.

"A couple of days later off Beach Haven, another steamer came by us. She was from Porto Rico, I think, she waren't American. She sent a boat to us and offered to tow us into port for $7,500. I laughed at 'em. I knowed I was safe so far as the steamer was concerned, but I had a hard fight to keep the crew aboard. They cried and yelled, and the Portuguese howled about saints. The big feller, he flashed a knife, but I jest talked to 'em some more like they was babies. That quieted 'em. The mate he had to pull his gun once, but never had to call for such. I didn't even use my fists.

"No; I didn't get much sleep. I really only had myself to rely on, and I was afraid to shet my eyes, for fear the crew might beach her or get some passin' vessel to take 'em off. Ev'ry now and then a party of 'em would come to me and want to know whether I was trying to get 'em drowned. I laughed at 'em and told 'em they was getting plenty to eat. "Ain't you?' I asked. 'Ain't there a fire in the galley? Ain't there grub and water? When there ain't then you can come and kick.' But they didn't see things that way. They was cold and they had to work hard, and the waves come over us pretty free, and they got wet.

"Part of the time we had to lie to 'count of our not being able to tack. I calculated on makin' for New York if I could get a steady so'east blow, or for Deleware Breakwater, if it came out of the no'east. As I said I was afraid to run in close to shore for fear bein' unable to tack would keep us from gettin' out again. The deadload had all gone flush with the bulwarks, the wheel was twisted and we didn't have a hole lamp on the ship. We started out with two sets of side-lights, but I dont believe there's one left. As for the cabin, it was a wreck—nothin' left.

"A couple of days ago we managed to wallow into fairly shoal water off the Jersey coast, where we took soundin's and found five fathoms. So I anchored her, knowin' help wouldn't be long comin'. An' that was where we was when the tug came to us. But in the course of them eight or nine days I reckon we did more jibin' into the gulf stream and out again than any other vessel from the time of Noah. And all the time to get near to New York."

A grin spread over Capt. Bill's wrinkled, brick-red countenance, and he winked slowly. "It meant less for towin' dues," he added, explanitorily. "I was sorry to run into any trouble, but after havin' done so against my will, I made up my mind I'd get what was left of the Trainer into port, come wind, come calm. The only thing that disappointed me was Cambridge goin' over to mutineers. I thought I could trust that cuss, but he wasn't proof to the last. 'Twas only the other night I heard him and the Portugee sizen' up the chances of killin' me and gettin' ashore. They could have said I was washed overboard—I was, nearly, two or three times."

Capt. Bill said nothing about the time a broken boom felled him to the deck, the day the Trainor was dismasted, and cracked one of his ribs. Neither did he tell how, despite the rib, he had kept himself going through all the days and nights of storm and restless effort, struggling with a feeble jury rig and a cowardly crew. "Jest a passel of babies," he summed up. "That's all. Why, the Portugee tried to get into the boat with me this mornin' when I was comin' ashore, but I put him aboard again. 'No, sir,' I says 'You stay aboard until you get discharged.' And before that they come to me in a body and opined that, havin' stood by the ship as they had, they ought to get extra wages. I laughed at 'em, jest the same like they was babies instead of tame pirates."

The Trainor is anchored off Red Hook, and will later be towed to Norwalk, with such of her cargo as is left.

CARDINAL GIBBONS TALKS ON THE EVILS OF DIVORCE

High Dignitary Responds to Remarks Made By Maryland Judge.

Cardinal Gibbons, in an interview, replied to remarks of former supreme Court Justice Henry B. Brown, before the Maryland Bar Association at Old Point Comfort last week. The Cardinal after expressing his high esteem for the former justice, both as a citizen and as a jurist, said:

"In a recent convention of lawyers held at Old Point Comfort, Justice Brown while referring to myself in kind and courteous language, has taken exceptions to my views on divorce and re-marriage. He is reported to have referred to the founder of the Christian religion as an "idealist" whose sentiments, while suitable to less favored times and circumstances are not adapted to this enlightened age.

"The learned jurist will permit me to say that the teachings of Christ have been the basis of all Christian legislation for nearly 2,000 years and continue to be the light and guide of hundreds of millions of souls.

"We are indebted to this Divine Legislator for the Christian civilization that rules the destinies of Europe, North and South America, Australia, and large portions of Asia and Africa. Neither Solon nor Lycurgus, nor Justinian nor Napoleon, nor any other framer of laws ever exerted a tithe of influence which the gospel of Christ exercised on the human race.

"And there is no subject which he treats more fully and clearly than the question of marriage, which is the very foundation stone of our family and social life. In three of the gospels He proclaims the unity of marriage and permits separation of a married couple only for the cause of adultery. I do not see why a law which has been enforced and cordially accepted in every age and country where Christianity dominates should be considered obsolete or impracticable in the United States.

"The multiplication of divorces," continued the cardinal, "is largely ascribed by some writer not to our divorce laws, but to the eager and reckless manner in which ministers of God officiate at marriage services. I have no word of apology or excuse for the scandalous conduct of some clergymen in this respect. But are not these persons confounding cause for effect?

"Divorces are multiplied not by ministers willingly assisting at ill-assorted marriages, but because loose legislation on matrimony renders it easy for married parties to annul the marriage bond. If the civil laws of all our states were as strict as they are in South Carolina and in Canada, the persons contemplating marriage would seriously and prayerfully reflect: they would study each other's disposition and temperament before engaging in a contract which would bind them for life.

"And certainly the peace and good order in family life in South Carolina and Canada can be favorably compared with the domestic conditions existing in those states where divorces can be easily obtained."

At the solicitation of many friends I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination for House of Delegates, subject to the decision of the Republican nominating convention, and solicit the support of all Republicans of the county. If elected I will exert my best endeavors to serve the people faithfully and well. D. E. BOLDEN.
Oakland, Md., July 19, 1909.

FOR COUNTY COMMISSIONER.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination for County Commissioner, subject to the decision of the Republican convention, and earnestly solicit the support of my friends throughout the county.

W. M. LOWDERMILK.
Selbysport, July 12, 1909.

UP TO THE PRESIDENT.

The ipse dixit of Senator Aldrich will not convince the country that the senate substitute for the Payne bill is really a fulfillment of Republican campaign pledges. The Chicago platform promises, as interpeted in the Taft utterances, called in unmistakable terms for a substantial tariff revision downward. The Payne bill, as it left the house, impressed the country as an honest attempt at such revisions. The action of the senate on all important schedules has been to restore approximately the Dingley rates, and in some instances even to raise them above the Dingley mark, at the instance of the trust representatives. The influential Republican papers of the country, east and west, have voiced the popular protest against this trust-controlled action of the senatorial reactionaries. The Aldrich following has steadily refused to give heed to this protest. Speaker Cannon has packed the house end of the conference committee with a view to jamming the trust program through congress. The reactionaries appear determined to carry their part or smash the Republican party.

The one man in the United States who has the power to bring the plans of these reactionaries to nought is President Taft. He was nominated and elected in spite of the vigorous opposition of these same abhorrent political and economic forces. The people now look to him to protect them against this new demonstration of the power of the predatory trust. The President can insist that the conference committee shall present to the two houses a tariff measure which is a "substantial revision downward" in place of the senatorial re-enactment of the Dingley law. The attitude of the leading Republican papers of the country should show the President that the masses of the party are with him in any fight he may have to make against the reactionaries of the senate and the so-called interest which they represent. The triumph of the Aldrich idea in tariff legislation, as contrasted with the spirit and purpose of the Payne bill as it passed the house, would mean Republican disaster, and the one man who can avert such a calamity is William Howard Taft, President of the United States. It is up to him.

VALUE OF ADVERTISING.

Communities are now beginning to realize the value of advertising. Its merit is being discovered by combinations as well as firms and individuals, as witness the following:

Florida orange growers, according to the Worcester Telegram, have been suddenly awakened to the value of advertising by an investigation of the methods of the California Fruit Exchange. While some sections of Florida have been asleep California has been systematically widening the market for its products. Two years ago the California growers spent $5,000 for news paper and auxiliary publicity. Last year they increased the appropriation to $25,000. This year they are spending $50,000. As an instance of what may be accomplished by the application of modern business methods in fruit raising the effect of the advertising campaign upon the fruit consumption of Sioux City is cited. Sioux City consumed 90 carloads of California fruit in one year without advertising inducement; the next year, under the persuasion of publicity, 172 carloads were marketed there. The Florida growers are now determined to use California methods to make the country consume more fruit and to supply the increase from Florida orchards.

The field of advertising is ever increasing, and there is nothing like it to make two sales grow when but one grew before.

UNITED STATES A SEA POWER.

European papers are engaged in a lively discussion over the relative strength of the navies of the world. The French papers are contending that the American navy is equal, if not superior, to that of Germany. Magazine experts here have demonstrated to their own satisfaction that the United States Navy is wholly worthless; that in a battle with any modern fleet the vessels which we sent on a cruise around the world would go down as if they were made of paper. So we are, or ought to be, duly grateful to the French writers for proving that we stand second to Great Britian in sea power.

Nobody on this side of the ocean is seriously anticipating war with any other nation, but, on the other hand, few Americans tremble at the word "war." In all the naval conflicts in which this country has been engaged, from the time when John Paul Jones, in the old, rotten, and unwieldy Bon Homme Richard, met and destroyed the Serapis and Countess of Scarborough off the coast of Scotland in 1779, down to the time when Schley destroyed the Spanish fleet in Santiago harbor, the American navy never met with a disastrous defeat. It occasionally lost individual ships, as, for example, the Chesapeake, in its fight with the Shannon, or the Essex, while contending with the Phoebe and Cherub in the harbor at Valparaiso, but in every case where the chances were even, our ships have won.

MILLIONS FOR EQIPMENT

The announcement by the B. & O. management of plans to immediately increase the rolling-stock equipment of the system to an extent that will involve an expenditure of more than $9,000,000 must certainly be taken to indicate that the period of side-tracked and idle cars has passed. And it would also seem to indicate that the railroad company is not anticipating another such slackened period as that which followed the 1907 panic.

Good business for the railroads is dependent upon and always reflects activity and prosperity in other branches of business. Of the 6,000 freight cars which are to be added to carrying outfit of the road 2,000 will be of a special design for the handling of coke and 1,000 of another design exclusively for the transportation of structural steel. The prospective 3,000,000,000-bushel corn crop has probably suggested in advance the need of 1,000 extra box cars that are included in the order to be placed and the 65 high-speed engines of the type that is adapted to the drawing of the heaviest trains round out the suggestiveness of a big increase in business looming just ahead.

Another and more direct indication that business is getting back to high-pressure conditions along the B. & O. system is the fact that the gross earnings of the road for June, 1909, exceeded those for June, 1908, by $775,830. This is significant in connection with the fact that the gross earninings for the entire period of the year ended with last June were less by $2,565,262 than for the previous year. The year just closed however, has shown a notable increase in net profits, because of the fact that running expenses were less by $6,508,903 than for the previous year.

WHAT WILL THE PANAMA CANAL COST US AND WHAT WILL IT PAY US?

The important agreement Thursday at a conference at the White House to add to the tariff bill a provision authorizing a total bond issue of $447,003,000 for the completion of the Panama Canal marks the vast growth of an enterprise the cost of which was estimated by its early advocates at under $50,000,000. The sum now called for, approximating nearly half a billion, is to include the $130,000,000 of bonds already authorized by the Spooner act. The present increase of bonds authorized is is accordingly $317,000,000. Of this increase $50,000,000 is to be applied to reimbursing the Treasury—now needing cash—for the $50,000,000 paid out of its working balance some years ago to the French company for its property rights and to the Republic of Panama for the Canal Zone. There will be left $267,000,000 of the new bonds, plus $44,000,000 of unsold Spooner bonds, or $311,000,000 in all, to spend in canal construction. Colonel Goethals' recent estimate of the total cost of the canal was $390,000,000. Of this, it appears, $86,000,000, plus the $50,000,000 paid as stated above, or $136,000,000 in all, has been spent so far on the canal, and has already been stated, $311,000,000 remains to be spent. It is by no means certain that the $447,000,000 provided will cover the ultimate total cost. It is not unlikely that in the end the cost will have exceeded $500,000,000.

This enormous total will be better appreciated when it is recalled that the Suez Canal in its present improved form cost but little over $100,000,000; the Manchester Ship Canal, $75,000,000; the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal, $40,000,000; the Welland Canal, $25,000,000; the Chicago Sanitary and Ship Canal, $34,000,000.

Will the traffic using the Panama Canal and the tolls arising therefrom be commensurate with its estimated cost of $500,000,000? In other words, will the tonnage of shipping using it be large enough to pay as much as 2 per cent, net on the investment? Estimates of tonnage likely to use the canal differ widely. Mr. Nimmo some years ago put the tonnage at under 7,000,000 tons, while others were putting it as high as 7,000,000, or higher. It was held that the competition of the transcontinental railways of Canada, the United States, Mexico and South America would largely prevent the exports and imports of the west coast of North and South America from seeking New York and Europe by way of the Panama Canal. Trade originating on the Pacific coast of South America north of Chile might seek the canal, but the nitrate exports of Chile would find it cheaper to go around the Cape, if canal tolls were to be paid at Panama. As for the trade of Australia, it would also prefer the all-sea route eastward, and the Suez Canal would hold most of the trade of Japan, China, Ceylon and India westward with Europe and the Atlantic Coast cities of the United States. The barrenness of the route via the Panama Canal was contrasted with the traffic producing regions touched via the Suez Canal and attention was called to the superior coaling facilities of the latter route.

Doubtless the Southern, or Gulf ports would profit by the shorter route to San Francisco and the Orient, and the existence of trade facilities would tend to develop new traffic-producing areas. But the competition of the transcontinental railways would prevent, it has been argued, any considerable deflection of trade to the canal, just as it prevented increase of the traffic of the Panama railway.

It may be noted that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty forbids the United States to discriminate in tolls in favor of its own citizens. They will have, however, the advantage, it is estimated, of a shortening of the distance between New York and the Pacific ports of South America by an average of 5,000 miles.

The political and naval advantages derived by the United States from the Panama Canal will be, however, so considerable that its friends are ready to put its commercial profitableness in the second place. A long time must elapse before it pays in dollars and cents, but its existence will be an extremely valuable national asset.

For House of Delegates.

By reference to the head of the editorial page of this issue of THE REPUBLICAN it will be seen that Mr. D. E. Bolden, of Oakland, makes formal announcement of his candidacy for the nomination as a member of the House of Delegates. Mr. Bolden has been a life-long resident of Oakland. He is a son of the late Charles W. Bolden, a Civil War veteran. He is a staunch Republican and at present one of the two Republican members of the Oakland Council. For many years he has been engaged in the furniture and undertaking business, which he has operated in connection with his work as a contractor and builder. Should Mr. Bolden be chosen to represent the people of Garrett county at Annapolis he will no doubt render a good account of his stewardship.

The Burke-McCann Company.

The Burke McCann Company will begin a week's engagement under canvas in Oakland commencing Monday, July 26. This is the second visit of this popular company to our town and the good impression made by them is still remembered by the lovers of drama and vaudeville. The company is still headed by William Francis Burke, the Irish singer and actor, and Geraldine McCann, the latter who will be remembered as the child actress, now grown up as a full-fledged leading lady. Other members of the old company are still in the cast and that famous family of dancers, the McCann family, will appear in their delightful specialties nightly. The opening play will be "A Romance in Ireland," a play produced very successfully throughout the country by the well-known comedian, Andrew Mack. The part of Earl O'Connell gives Mr. Burke an opportunity to appear at his best, and during the action of the play he sings several of his own songs. Mr. J. Ross Friend, one of Garrett county's prominent young men, being at the front of the show, makes it a guaranteed attraction.

Republican Primaries

Office of the Republican Central Committee for Garrett County.

Notice is hereby given to the Republican voters of Garrett County, that in pursuance of the provisions of Chapter 737, of the Acts of the General Assembly of Maryland, 1908, known and designated as "Primary Election Law," a Primary Election for the Republican voters of Garrett County, Maryland, will be held in said County on Saturday, August 14th, 1909, between the hours of 1 P. GIVE THEM A START

The New Year is rapidly approaching. This would be a good time for you to start your young folks on the road to Success.

Early training in the practice of self-denial; instruction as to the use and value of money; opportunities for earning and saving money; all these tend to fix and fasten the children in the ways of thrift and prosperity.

We most gladly assist the young people in getting started.

One Dollar opens an account and entities the depositor to one of our Savings Banks.

Excursion to Oakland Sunday.

On Sunday next, the 25th inst., an excursion from various points east and west along the line of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad will be run to Oakland under the auspices of the Young Men's Institute, a Catholic society, which has members in almost every place where the Catholic church is established. A large number of people are expected to take advantage of the very low rates of fare to be in effect that day.

Rev. G. W. Kepler to Preach.

In the absence of Rev. J. B. Workman, who is at Webster Springs, Rev. George W. Kepler, a former pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, will preach in in that edifice on Sunday morning next at the usual hour.

COME IN AND GET ACQUAINTED

Mrs. John Ault went to Pittsburg, Pa., last Thursday night in response to a telegram announcing the very serious illness of her mother, who suffered a second and very severe stroke of paralysis, since which time the sufferer has been in a semi-conscious condition.

Garthright is offering some most excellent bargains in suitings, waistings, shoes, hats, to close out summer goods, and will take fresh made, sweet butter and fresh eggs, will pay 22 cents for each and part cash, for immediate delivery. Will pay, 20 cents lb. for young chickens and 12 cents for fat hens, if brought in at once. 20-2t

Attention is directed to the advertisement of the Maryland Agricultural College, which appears in another column of this paper today. This school is among the many good ones of Maryland and makes a specialty of agriculture and its kindred pursuits.

Rev. Dr. R. B. Ward, of Oakland, who went from here to Seattle two or three weeks ago to attend the sessions of the International Epworth League Convention, returned to his home in Oakland last Thursday night, after an absence of about two weeks.

Mr. Isaac A. Paugh, one of Garrett county's most progressive and best read farmers, was in the city a few hours last Saturday when he paid this office a visit. Mr. Paugh, besides being well up on agriculture, is an entertaining talker and practical man on horticultural subjects.

Mr. J. D. Northrup, general manager of the Northern Natural Gas Company, accompanied by Mrs. Northrup, arrived in Oakland from Cumberland on last Friday where they expect to remain two or three weeks as guests of Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Cheuvront at their home on Green street.

Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Gnagey, of West Milton, O., who have been spending the time since annual meeting with their son Milton and family of the South Side, left for their home this morning. They broke their visit here a week or so to visit their old home at Accident, Md.—Meyersdale Commercial.

A report was circulated in Oakland last Friday night that an unknown man had been struck and very seriously injured at the water station in Oakland by a passing train and when a number of railroad men arrived at the station to carry the supposedly injured man to a physician's office, he had vanished.

Mr. John Felty, of the Felty-West Lumber Company, after spending a week at Mountain Lake Park with his family, returned to Rowlesburg Sunday afternoon at which point the company with which he is connected is now operating a large saw mill, the output being shipped to different points along the line of the B. & O.

Mr. W. R. Coglan, chief operator of the W. U. Telegraph Company in Oakland, went to Baltimore one day last week and on Saturday underwent a painful surgical operation in St. Joseph's Hospital. Reports of his condition are received daily by his brother operators in Oakland and these indicate that he is well on the road to recovery.

Road building is becoming a science, and instead of having work done under the direction of county or town officials, the States are assuming the responsibility of control, with excellent results. In Massachusetts road making under the supervision of the State officials has become an art, and, as a consequence, the Old Bay State is creating a system of highways which has few equals anywhere.

Mr. M. J. Parsons came down from his summer home at Mt. Lake Park this morning, where he has been for several weeks, to attend to some business matters. Mrs. Parsons, he stated returned Friday from her big trip in the West. She was a delegate from this state to the National Convention of the Woman Suffragist and is now at Mt. Lake Park. She visited the big fair while in the west.—Grafton Republican.

Dr. J. Lee McComas is having his office building on Second street repaired and when the work is completed it is his intention to again enter actively into the practice of his profession. In point of years Dr. McComas is probably the oldest resident physician of all this section of country and until he met with an accident a few years ago which rendered him an invalid for a year or more his services were in great demand not only at home but in other sections of the country.

The condition of the National banks of the United States, as shown in the reports given to the treasury department, is flattering in the extreme. This statement, which covers the period between April 28 and June 23, shows an increase in total resources of $102,848,820, while the total resources and liabilities aggregate $9,471,732,063. The banks have over $694,000,000 in specie and $191,000,000 in legal tender. Since the April call, the increase in individual deposits was $72,516,312.

Miss Elizabeth Weber, who has been in Cumberland for the past year or more, returned to her home near Oakland last week and on Sunday morning morning left for St. Joseph, Mo., at which point she expects to join the Millenial Dawn excursion party for its pilgrimage through the south and west. Miss Weber may be gone several weeks as the party expects to cover almost all of the southwest and middle west states, returning to Chicago, Ill., where the party will disband about August 15th.

Our sister city of Terra Alta is coming to the front as witness the contract awarded one day last week for more than five thousand square yards of street paving to the Enterprise Paving Company, of Elkins, W. Va. With her streets paved, natural gas, water and sewerage and her enterprising business men—and all of them work in harmony—Terra Alta will soon rival her more pretentious neighbors, such as Grafton, Fairmont and other towns. Oakland is too far ahead for Terra Alta to ever catch up.

Rev. F. A. B. Wunnenberg of Washington, D. C., where he is pastor of the Fifth street Catholic church, spent a week at Brookside and came to Oakland last Friday afternoon where he was the guest of Rev. J. E. Connell until Tuesday, when he returned to Washington. Rev. Wunnenburg will be remembered as the popular priest in charge of the Oakland church a few years ago where he made and retained a large number of friends, all of whom were glad to welcome him to Oakland, even if it were for only a brief visit.

A party composed of eleven residents of Thomas, W. Va., drove from that point to Mountain Lake Park last Sunday morning and registered at Mt. Lake Hotel, where they spent the day, returning to Thomas the same night. Those in the party were Messrs. B. E. Boyer, Clyde McDowell, Marvin Wilkinson, Wm. MacVeigh, Edward Baker, John Higgins, Lee Davis, Elwood Dickens, Charles Hoyt, John Shafer and Meed Getterson. The party also visited Oakland during the day where they were entertained by Mr. N. R. Sanner.

Rev. J. B. Workman, pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, left here for Webster Springs, W. Va., Monday morning where he went with the hope of benefitting his health which has been in a run-down condition for several weeks past. Mr. Workman has stood faithfully by his work for the past five years and the rest he will receive by his visit to Webster Springs, aside from the results of the mineral water always at hand in that delectable region, will no doubt prove beneficial to him. We trust that he may return to Oakland fully restored to his old time vigor and strength.

Tuesday morning Attorney General Isaac Loeb Straus, accompanied by Senator W. McCulloh Brown, ex-Senator R. T. Browning, Mr. E. H. Sincell, Mr. Ridgely Fisher and one or two others, left Oakland for Fairfax Stone from which point they walked over the line surveyed by the engineers of Maryland and West Virginia a number of years ago to define the boundary between the two states. Argument in the case will be made before the United State Supreme Court in October and to better acquaint himself with features of the matter the attorney general thought it wise to personally go over the ground, hence his visit to Oakland.

Last Sunday morning a party of Oakland's young people journeyed to Swallow Falls to view the natural scenery for which that place is famous. Although several showers caused them to miss part of the scenery all enjoyed a very pleasant day. After a splendid supper was served they started on their journey homeward. Those who composed the party were: Miss Tecla Johnson, Miss Irene Cromwell, Miss Vernie Schrock, Miss Alma Scherr, Miss Anna Lowenstein, Miss Margaret Lawton, Mr. Wellington Crane, Mr. Mark White, Mr. Roy Hammond, Mr. Paul Naylor, Mr. Allen Justice and Mr. Gordon Mealy.

Mr. Charles H. Shaffer, of the United States Patent Office, where he is engaged as an examiner on ice machines and other intricate and complicated patents, returned to Washington from a week's visit to his home in District No. 8, last Saturday afternoon. While visiting his home Mr. Shaffer combined work and pleasure by erecting on his father's farm a reinforced concrete cave wherein to store potatoes, apples and other products of the farm for winter consumption. The dimensions of the cave are 14x24 feet, 6 feet high, and in addition to the side walls being constructed of concrete the roof is of the same material also and is probably the first all-concrete structure erected in Garrett county.

Mr. Harvey J. Speicher, of Accident, came to Oakland Tuesday to attend a meeting of the County Committee, composed of himself, Col. A. G. Sturgiss and Mr. Jonas Yutzy, the object of the meeting being to arrange dates and decide upon the manner of making the nominations for the various county offices to be filled by ballot this fall. The committee, or at least the majority number, concluded that the direct primaries under the present law would be unsatisfactory to the majority of the Republicans and hence have issued a call for the primaries to be conducted for the purpose of electing delegates to the county convention, which body will name the county ticket. The call is published elsewhere in this paper today.

By an Act of the General Assembly of Maryland, passed at the January session, 1896, being chapter 56, Section 45, it is provided that all county taxes shall be due and payable on the first day of September next succeeding the date of levy thereof and all taxes paid on or before the first day of September a discount of three per cent. shall be allowed; and after the first day of January all taxes shall bear interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum until paid. The treasurer shall take the discount from and charge interest on the bills for county purposes regularly in the manner aforesaid and shall note the same upon his books and upon the receipt for taxes so paid, but the discount allowed on the county taxes by this section shall not be made to any person or corporate institution unless the whole amount of state and county taxes due by such person or corporate institution for the current year be paid when the same is made.

All persons who owe 1908 tax will please make immediate payment.

W. E. HOLLINGER,
Treasurer of Garrett County, Md.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man wanted by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda, through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.—He entered the cabin and discovered the English woman and her maid.

CHAPTER VIII. — Stephens quickly learned the wrong vessel had been captured, Lord Darlington's private yacht, the lord's wife and maid being aboard. He explained the situation to her ladyship.

CHAPTER IX.—Then First Mate Tuttle had bare the plot, saying that the Sea Queen had been taken in order to go to the Antarctic circle.

CHAPTER X.—Tuttle explained that on a former voyage he had learned that the Donna Isabel was lost in '52. He had found it frozen in a huge case of ice on an island and contained much gold.

CHAPTER XI.—Stephens, however, consented to be captain of the expedition. He told Lady Darlington. She was greatly alarmed, but expressed confidence in him.

CHAPTER XII.—The Sea Queen encountered a vessel in the fog. Stephens attempted to communicate, which caused a fierce struggle and he was overcome. Tuttle finally squaring the situation. Then the Sea Queen headed south again.

CHAPTER XIII.—Under Tuttle's guidance the vessel made progress toward its goal.

CHAPTER XIV.—De Nova, the mate, told Stephens that he believed Tuttle, now acting as skipper, insane because of his queer actions.

CHAPTER XV.—Stephens was awakened by crashing of glass. He saw Tuttle in the grip of a spasm of religious mania and overcame him. The sailor upon regaining his senses was taken ill.

CHAPTER XVI.—Tuttle committed suicide by shooting. Upon vote of the crew Stephens assumed the leadership and the men decided to continue the treasure hunt, the islands being supposed to be only 200 miles distant.

CHAPTER XVII.—Tuttle was buried in the sea, Lady Darlington pronouncing the service. Stephens awaiting from sleep saw the ghost, supposed to have formed the basis for Tuttle's religious mania.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Upon advice of Lady Darlington, Stephens started to probe the ghost. He came upon Lieut. Sanchez, the drunken officer he had humbled in Chile. He found that at Sanchez' inspiration, Engineer McKnight played "ghost" to scare the men into giving up the quest.

CHAPTER XIX.—Stephens announced that the Sea Queen was at the spot where Tuttle's quest was supposed to be. The crew was anxious to go on in further search. De Nova and Stephens conquered them in a fist fight. Lady Darlington thanked him.

CHAPTER XX.—The Sea Queen started northward. She was wrecked in a fog. Stephens, De Nova, Lady Darlington and her maid being among those to set out in a life boat.

CHAPTER XXI.—Ten were rescued. Stephens saw only one chance in a thousand for life. Lady Darlington confessed her love to Stephens and he did likewise.

smashed beyond repair, lay against the starboard rail. The after-cabin, built like a house, extended the entire width of the deck, a lumping affair, overhung with huge, projecting timbers, topped by ornate carvings, and having two companionways leading up, one of them crushed into splinters. The forward shutters were tightly closed, and the whole front appeared a solid mass of glittering ice, so obscured by frozen particles of snow as to render any discovery of the door an impossibility. We began hacking at it with our knives, judging the opening would naturally be at the center, but the sheathing of ice proved so thick and solid that we made little impression.

"It will take us a week to cut our way in with these things," I said at last. "De Nova, I think I saw an ax frozen in at the left of the galley. Take a man with you and pry it out."

It proved an odd-looking instrument—a meat-cleaver, I imagine—but was sufficiently strong and heavy. Kelly swung it vigorously, cleaving off the ice in cakes, until we were finally able to trace the fitting of the door. Suddenly, striking at the upper panel, he dislodged a considerable chunk, thus revealing half a dozen letters painted across the front. Dade pried off a few inches more with his knife-blade, and we stared up incredulously at the words:

Donna Isabel
Cadiz

"Holy Mother of God!" and De Nova, in his excitement, danced about recklessly, forgetting the slipperiness of deck undercoat. "It was ze treasure ship! It was ze t'ree million pesos! Sacre dam!"

It does not appear possible that I perceived it all, but now, looking back, I can recall the attitude of every man as this revelation of the vessel's identity was swiftly borne in upon his consciousness. Sanchez sank affrightedly to his knees, fingering the beads of a rosary, his lips muttering inarticulate fragments of prayer; Dade stared, white-faced and trembling, his mouth wide open; Kelly jerked his cap from off his red hair and swung it over his head with a wild yell; Johnson never stirred, a motionless statue, his lips compressed; the negro joined De Nova, his eyes rolling, his great feet pounding the snow; while McKnight grabbed the ax from Kelly's heedless fingers and began slashing at the door. As for myself, at the instant everything was chaos. Tuttle was right, then; he had seen all that he said; our voyage had not been causeless, a search after a will-o'-the-wisp; the sacrifices, suffering, loss of these past months, were not all in vain. Out of Antarctic solitudes, released from the merciless grip of the ice by some marvel of deliverance, this treasure galleon of Old Spain, this ancient tomb of dead sailors, had come drifting down to us, a veritable gift of God. The knowledge stunned me; dazed my perceptions. It seemed a miracle. I could only press my hands to my eyes, stare blindly at that inscription, and struggle back to a conception of reality. It was Kelly's wild shout and McKnight's blow that aroused me, recalling me as instantly to command.

"Stop that!" I shouted, catching the latter roughly by the arm. "We shall need that cabin door. If there indeed be a treasure down below, we can hunt for it like men and not maniacs. McKnight, if you strike another blow I'll drop you where you stand. Take knives and dig the ice out of the cracks. Get down on your knees at the bottom, Dade, and don't stand there like a fool. De Nova, see if you can locate the front windows—there must be two of them—and cut the ice away from the shutters."

As they labored feverishly, their breath steaming in the frosty air, the moonlight silvering them and gleaming weirdly on the scattered ice-fragments, the haunting mystery of that hermetically sealed cabin brought to me a feeling of unutterable horror. Heaven! how long had it been thus frozen in? What awful tragedy of another century was about to be revealed? What years of loneliness, of darkness, of polar night and cold had this derelict of the grim Antarctic experienced? Where had it been? What of those who had sailed on board out of Guayaquil that fair June day of 1753, dreaming of the glad welcome awaiting them in sunny Spain? What of the crew, hardy seamen all, black-bearded, the gold loops in their ears? What of the passengers? What of the five women who had walked these decks? Where had they died, and how?

I clenched my hands, my nerves throbbing, tramping from rail to rail in excitement as the men hacked, yet I was first to grasp the exposed latch, and force the released wood backward in its groves. Through the narrow opening thus attained there came whistling a blast so frigid as to drive us headlong back, gasping for breath. Cold as it was without there on the open deck, that cabin revealed a temperature so awful in intensity as to make us recoil before it, our hands to our faces. A hundred years of winter—the black eternal winter of the south pole—smote us with icy breath, seeming fairly to sear the flesh with its frozen touch. Dade dropped under it, and we dragged him aside, sobbing like a baby. It was several minutes before we could even draw near enough to hack away more of the ice and, with the ax, drive the door farther back into its grooves.

It was intensely dark within, every window and porthole shrouded, only the narrow door-opening permitting the slight glimmer of the moon to touch the edge of the black interior. I wrapped my muffler to the very eyes, and stepped across the threshold, feeling as if the icy air grasped me with actual fingers, yet resolute to learn all, and confident no other there would ever venture it. I touched an overturned bench with my knee; my fingers explored the back of a heavy chair having a carven top, and then came into contact with a bare table, heavily ridged along the edge. Seemingly this stood crossways of the cabin; and I felt cautiously along it, a deeper cowardice gripping me with every hesitating step forward in the dark. Suddenly I touched hair and the gelid coldness of frozen flesh, and as instantly leaped backward, mad with nameless terror. The overturned bench tripped me, and I fell, grasping at the door casements, and thus dragged myself out of that hell-hole by my arms.

CHAPTER XXIV.

In Which I Explore the Cabin.

De Nova assisted me to my feet, the other men crowding about, their faces filled with wonderment. "For God's sake, w'at is it, monsieur?"

"There are dead men in there," I explained, already ashamed of my display of terror. "I—I touched one in the dark."

They drew back from the open door, gazing with new horror into the blackness of the interior; but my own courage was rapidly returning, as I realized that I must lead and control.

"Well, lads, it startled me, all right, but we cannot afford to give up this ship to dead men. De Nova, take Kelly with you, and try to discover something on board with which to make a flare. There ought to be plenty of dry stuff in the galley. Not a word to the women about what I found aft."

The rest of us hacked away, while they were gone, at the ice concealing the front window shutters, and partly uncovered one. But we could get no purchase upon it from the outside and no one volunteered to venture within. I kept them all busy, however, the hard work and sense of command combining to restore my own nerves to a normal condition. The mate despairing of doing better, finally brought back a table-leg of pitch pine which we contrived to ignite after several unsuccessful experiments, the yellowish-red flames circling the heavy end like so many coiling serpents, and sending forth a weird reflection through spirals of black smoke. It was a poor glim enough, yet it would serve; and I bore it inside, holding the torch well before me, the men clustering about the door.

The mottled flare cast mingled light and shadow over the horrors thus dimly revealed, rendering the ghastly sight one to chill the blood of any man. The cabin was a long one, extending aft clear to the stern, the immense butt of the mizzen-mast almost separating it into two apartments. About this was arranged a great arm-rack completely filled with a variety of weapons, many of them flashing back the glittering rays of the torch. At one time that had been a rare sea-parlor, but now it was a wreck, the walls and ceiling dingy with smoke, the gilt defaced and battered. Overturned furniture was everywhere; piles of clothing, and a perfect riffraff of articles strewed the deck floor; a violin lay almost at my feet, all but one string snapped; and some sort of an odd music-box rested against the bench over which I had fallen. A great square box-stove stood just before the mast-butt, a huge pile of ashes all about. An immense lantern, as strange a looking contrivance as ever I saw, swung solemnly from a deck-beam, and just beyond, suspended by wires, was a gorgeously colored picture of the "Madonna and Child."

I beheld all these details at a glance, although at the time I scarcely realized any of them, my entire horrified attention being riveted upon the scene of death revealed. The table, which I had previously touched, extending crossways of the cabin, was uncovered but contained plates, cups, a large bottle half-filled, and some scraps of frozen food. The bodies of two men, one with a cloak over his shoulders, occupied the bench within three feet of me. The one nearest had fallen sideways, and hung there, his arm hooked across the back of the bench, his long, black hair dangling over his face; the other sat with head bowed on the table, his features hidden by his arms, but the gold rings in his ears plainly showing. Directly opposite these two, sitting bolt upright in a chair, eyes wide open, staring straight at me, was a third. My God! it was De Nova! The same eyes, the same dark curly hair, the same little black mustache, the same smile curling the thin lips. I could have sworn it was the mate, endeavoring to frighten and mock me. I even wheeled about angrily, flashing the light of my torch over that cluster of faces in the doorway. No! by heavens, the creole stood behind, and this, this counterpart, was a dead man—dead for a hundred years. No words can ever retell the struggle I made to control myself, the smoking torch shaking in my hand and casting its miserable flicker over that charnel house, every limb trembling like aspens, my eyes staring into the shadows. My very violence of fear angered me; what had I to be afraid of? How could these poor frozen bodies injure me? Nerved to the endeavor I stepped forward around the end of the table, throwing the faint glare of the torch into the after space concealed by the huge mast-butt. A tall, thin man sat on the deck, braced against the wall, his long, gray beard almost concealing his face; on a wide divan, nearly opposite, lay a woman, her dark hair loosened, a large diamond glittering on the hand which hung rigid over the edge of the couch. Just below her fingers, as if dropped there in final weakness, lay a baby's well-worn shoe.

I scarcely comprehend how I ever conquered the sickly horror that smote me as I gazed about upon this scene of death, rendered even more terrible by the silence and the flickering, smoking torch that furnished the only light. Nothing except the sense of command, the remembrance of those women waiting outside in the cook's galley, ever afforded me strength and courage to remain. The task must be done; by some one it must be accomplished, and that some one, of necessity, was myself. With clenched teeth, my face as white as those of the frozen dead about me, I advanced from door to door down one side of that cabin, and up the other. Out from the staterooms that had remained closed there came the same awful breath of the frigid south, rendering even the icy air of the main cabin ten times colder, and causing me to breathe with difficulty as I peered hastily within. These staterooms were all of fair size, the two situated farthest aft being unusually large and comfortably fitted, although in great disorder. In one only did I discover a body, that of a child of three or four years, flaxen-haired and bonny even in death. Upon the deck at the foot of the mast I discovered the vessel's log-book lying wide open, a quill pen beside it, exactly as it had been dropped. I did not take time to decipher the Spanish, inscribed in a scrawling hand, but my glance caught the date of that last entry—"September 11, 1753."

The date rang in my head crazily, as I stood there staring at them, totally unable to grasp or apprehend the truth. One hundred and twenty-six years!—Merciful God! And all that time those men had been there at that table; all through those days and nights, those months and years, that frozen image of De Nova had been smiling, his cold fingers clutching the glass; all through those decades that woman had been lying on the couch, that flaxen-haired baby in the bunk! There, exactly as we found them, during a century of Inky blackness, tossed about by the sea, cradled in the pitiless ice, smitten by the awful breath of eternal Winter, those bodies had remained rigid, motionless, even as the souls left them, for 126 years! It was unthinkable, inconceivable, miraculous, beyond all my power of apprehension. Blessed Mary! what changes the world had witnessed since these died! What wonders of discovery; what growth in faith; what widening of human knowledge; what generations of men and women had been born, lived, loved, and died since the deadly ice locked these into this floating tomb!

Not until after I had explored the last empty room and returned to the group at the door did I regain my senses and feel myself again a living, responsible being upon whose strength of will depended the future of all on board. A glance into those horrified faces told me instantly that they were ready for a mad retreat to the boat; that the slightest exhibition of weakness on my part would set them into a panic. I stiffened into resistance, all memory of the past blotted out utterly by the demands of the present.

"Men, we've come into a hard job here, but it is one which must be attended to," I said, gravely. "However, we'll wait until after breakfast before tackling the worst of it. Day is beginning now, and we will need all the light it gives us. Dade, get out some provisions from the boat, start a fire in the galley, and prepare a hot meal. Sanchez, go along and help; you will probably have to cut away some ice before the fire will draw. Not a word to the women about what you have seen aft, my lads."

The two started forward willingly enough, and I immediately turned to the others, marking their uneasy glances, and fully assured that I must keep them also busily employed, or else lose control altogether.

"We have too much to accomplish here to waste any time while those fellows are getting a meal ready," I continued, quickly. "McKnight, you tackle these front shutters. Kelly, climb up on the poop and dig the ice off the skylight and out of the funnel. We've got to have daylight and a fire. Now, De Nova, I want you and Johnson to help me. Come on, men; what are you two afraid of? These are all dead."

I fairly drove them to it, but it did them both good, although the manner in which they advanced down the cabin, their faces blanched under the torch glare, their bodies shaking as with ague, made me nervous and irritable. I put them at the after-ports, Johnson with the cleaver, and De Nova with his sheath-knife, and between the three of us we finally succeeded in wrenching both stern-ports free of their icy fetters. As we burst them open, through the wide apertures we looked forth into the gray dreariness of the dawn. Satisfied with what had thus been accomplished, we retraced our steps back through the cabin, observing that Kelly had made some progress above, the faint daylight already beginning to tinge that grim interior.

That breakfast was the first warm meal any of us had enjoyed for five days, and we ate it together, sitting about on the galley deck. The men were unusually silent, even the voluble Kelly holding his tongue. No doubt their thoughts were with their perilous situation and the grewsome task confronting them; yet they partook heartily of the food, and I endeavored by every means in my power to arouse their courage and cheerfulness. To that end I dwelt on the possibility of the wealth that might be concealed between decks, promising an early search. But I spoke most to Lady Darlington, admiring greatly the easy manner in which she bore herself amid such rude surroundings and adapted herself to the necessities of our situation. All semblance of pride and exclusiveness had vanished, and she was a simple-hearted woman, bearing her trials with silent fortitude. Only once did she even refer to our discoveries aft, and then only to appear perfectly satisfied when I explained that the cabin was in such disorder it would have to be cleaned before fit for occupancy. Rough as the experience of the previous night had been, her dress soiled, her hair ruffled, never had she appeared more attractive than when, sitting in the midst of us on that galley deck with the gray daylight streaming in through the broken roof, the ruddy flames of the fire flickered across her face. I saw the men glance toward her in respectful admiration as they filed out one by one, and thus left us for a moment alone. No matter what words I whispered in the brief time before I joined them, but as I glanced back where she remained standing, there was a smile upon her lips and a mist of tears in her eyes. As for myself, I was prepared for the work of the day.

The urgent need of getting some form of sail up and of releasing the rudder was indeed imperative; any approach of storm would have found us utterly helpless. Yet we could not live on board with those frozen bodies aft. I left Dade busied in the galley, and took the others with me. They went reluctantly, grumbling among themselves, yet I permitted them no opportunity for open revolt, driving them to the work I had decided upon, and shaming them by leading the way myself.

I need not dwell upon the unpleasant details. The most disagreeable portion fell to me, although Johnson took hold like a man after the first few moments of reluctance. The others devoted themselves diligently to scraping off the ice, gathering up and casting overboard the accumulation of litter about the main cabin and the various staterooms, and assisting us only as we passed the heavy, rigid bodies through the stern-ports. We performed this unpleasant task of burial hastily, but with all gentleness; there was little to do except to wrap the stiffened figures as best we might, weight them, though they were themselves like stone, and consign them to the gray sea. Not heartlessly, but with unspoken prayers upon our lips, we watched them sink silently into the depths they had resisted so long. Never shall I forget the face of the child, the last to be buried, nor the sickening feeling with which I sank back upon a bench, staring about the vacated cabin when the awful task was finally accomplished; yet the realization that it was over with, the cabin cleared and habitable, made new men of all of us. The bedding was brought forth and aired before the open ports, the furniture restored to position, and a fire started in the huge box-stove. This quickly warmed the icy interior and yielded a new aspect of cheerfulness. De Nova and Kelly explored the steward's pantry, discovering a quantity of frozen biscuit, several hams rigid as rock, together with numerous flasks of some liquid turned into solid ice. We found candles, also, hard as nails though they burned fairly well after a period of sputtering, and we fitted six of them into the great lantern. By noon we had completed the work, and had brought Lady Darlington and Celeste aft for dinner.

Southern Beaten Biscuit.

Sift together one quart flour, a salt-spoonful salt, and a half teaspoonful baking powder. Rub into the flour with the tips of the fingers a heaping tablespoonful lard, then add a cup of milk or enough to make a stiff dough, stiffer than for bread. Now if you follow the old time method of beating, take a biscuit beater or rolling pin and beat the dough on a block of hard wood until it blisters and pops. It takes a strong arm and a skillful one to beat well. Cut into rounds about the size of a watch (medium size), prick with a fork, and bake about 30 minutes in a moderate oven. If you like short cuts in your culinary methods instead of beating try running the dough through a food chopper about six times. This blisters the dough as well as the traditional method of beating and can be done in a tenth of the time.

Butter Scotch.

Put one-half pound of brown sugar, one gill of water and a tablespoonful of vinegar on to boil. Boil ten minutes, add two ounces of butter and continue boiling until brittle, when dropped in cold water. Turn into greased pans, and when cold, break into irregular pieces.

Paul Chief Missionary at Athens

Sunday School Lesson for July 25, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 17:16-34. Memory verse 29.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"God is a spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth."

TIME.—A. D. 51.

PLACE.—Athens, the capital of Greece and one of the most renowned and influential cities in the history of the world.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

1. Athens in St. Paul's day. Driven from Berea, as we learned in our last lesson, Paul came to Athens in Greece. As he walked from the Piraeus, where he landed, along the new road to the city, he saw raised at intervals altars to the unknown gods.

As the city of Athens came into his view his soul must have been filled with the deepest emotions. He had seen Jerusalem, the most influential city in the world for religion; he longed to go to Rome, which stood above all others in power, in law, in imperial sway, the capital of the world; but now he was to gaze upon the city which then stood and still stands enthroned above all others for intellectual supremacy, for literature, art, architecture and philosophy.

2. Paul Begins his Work in Athens.—Vs. 16-21. "While Paul waited" for Silas and Timothy to come from Berea before proceeding farther, or beginning special work in a new and peculiar field, "his spirit was stirred in him," urged on as with a sharp goad to give the Gospel to a "city wholly given to idolatry." His work was with four classes of persons. The Jews, devout persons, epicurean philosophers and stoics. These met Paul in debate.

3. Paul's Address Before the University of Athens.—Vs. 22-31. The Athenians were proud of their city and could be called by no higher title.

A Wisely Chosen Text. 23. "As I passed by" along the streets and avenues of the city, "and beheld your devotions," not acts of worship, but objects of worship—idols, altars, temples, "I found an altar with this inscription," to the unknown god, or an unknown god.

1. God the Creator of Heaven and Earth. 24. Not an idol to be seen and handled, not a being in human shape, not shut up to dwell "in temples made with hands."

2. His worship therefore must be spiritual. 25. "Neither is worshiped with men's hands," presenting to idols costly offerings, and food and drink. God wants not help, but love.

3. One God and All Men Brethren. 26. "Made of one blood," all races, kinds, and degrees are from God, and therefore are brethren.

4. His Desire Is That All Should Find Him. 27. "If haply they might feel after him and find him."

5. For We Are His Children. 28. "For in him we live, and move, and have our being." This is true both of our natural and of our spiritual life.

6. Therefore God Is a Spirit. 29. Therefore "we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold," etc. The human soul with its vast powers must have an author and father greater than itself, of the nature of spirit, but infinitely greater than our spirits.

7. If God Is Our Father We Should Be Children Worthy of Him. 30. "The times of this ignorance God winked at," overlooked, did not punish with the severity that falls upon willful sin against light and knowledge. "But now." Since Christ has come with new light, new motives, a new message from God. "Commandeth all men everywhere to repent." To turn from their sins, and live as children of a holy God should live.

8. New Motives. 31. (1) God "will judge the world in righteousness." Every decision will be right, correct, loving. God will judge men according to character and life, the test being whether they have done right or wrong; not their wealth or position or rank or genius. (2) The great motives were embodied in Jesus Christ "whom he hath ordained" to be the Saviour of men, the test of obedience, the way and the truth and the life. (3) "Hath given assurance," that he, Jesus, is the judge, the Saviour, the everliving King. "In that he hath raised him from the dead."

It is probable that Paul's address was cut short here before he had finished what he wished to say.

4. The Effects Produced by Paul's Address.—Vs. 32-34. 1. 32. "Some mocked." The teaching seemed absurd to them.

2. Some refused to decide. "We will hear thee again." Like Felix, they would wait for a more convenient season. They could endure almost any strange theories, but when it came to giving up their sins, and to a change of life, they rebelled.

3. A few accepted the truth, repented, and became disciples of Jesus. 34. "Dionysius the Areopagite," that is a member of the learned council before whom Paul had preached. Damaris.

The resurrection of Jesus proved that he was the Son of God, and was living, though unseen; that there is life beyond the grave.

Thus the duty to repent was enforced by new motives, of fear, of love, of hope; by new light on conduct, on the judgment, on God, on Heaven, on the future; by new helps and opportunities, through Christ's love, and teachings, and atonement, and example, and the Holy Spirit; by new proofs, through the resurrection of Christ, and the assurance it gave that he was the son of God, and that there is immortal life.

Changing The Day

Alphonse set the coffeepot close to Sheldon's hand and retired to the bar, there to indulge in a glass of beer. The dinner rush was over, and he was certain that no one would come now until after the theaters let out.

Meanwhile the two young people at the table would surely chat for half an hour or so, which time Alphonse might spend with profit in discussing with the fat bartender certain nice points in the mixing of cocktails.

Meanwhile his two patrons sipped their coffee, and Sheldon lit the cigar that Alphonse had brought. When he dined alone the cigar came from the corner box on the five cent end, but when the young lady came Alphonse always brought a perfecto from the box in the ice chest with an elaborately casual "The usual, monsieur."

This was intended to impress the guest with the belief that Sheldon habitually smoked fat perfectos with red and gold sashes. Tonight Alphonse's elaborate politeness was ignored by the usually genial Sheldon.

"Now for the news," he began as the waiter headed for the bar. "I couldn't wait for Saturday to tell you, though it is only two days off."

"Isn't it funny that we always fall ck on Saturday night?" commented Bess. "I don't know when we have been out to dinner in the middle of the week."

"Never, I guess," agreed Sheldon. "You see, Saturday is a sort of holiday. I get my salary, and you get your check from the publishers, and we're both happy and content, even if not in agreement."

"We would be in agreement if you would only stop considering a proposal as an essential feature of the Saturday celebration," reminded Bess, with a show of severity. "You must go and spoil it all by proposing, Fred, when I've told you long ago that to marry would spoil my career. I am making a little name for myself in the art world, and I can't keep house and paint too."

"And I've told you," retorted Fred, "that I would not stop asking you to marry me until you said 'Yes.' I guess I've proposed to you sixty times in the last sixty weeks, Bess, and I'm good for sixty times sixty if I have to hold out that long."

"Did you ask me out to dinner to propose to me?" demanded Bess.

"Not primarily," he admitted. "What I wanted to tell you was that my big chance has come at last. Benny Groll has made a good contract, and he needs a man to put a little money and a lot of time into the business. I have more experience than money, but Ben wants me, and he'll give me a half interest if I'll come in. It's what I've been working and waiting for ever since I came to town, Bess, and this is to celebrate my good luck."

A slender hand was stretched across the table and grasped his own.

"Dear boy, I am so glad," she said sincerely. "You have worked hard, and you are entitled to your reward."

"Which is why I am going to ask for it," retorted Sheldon. "I am going to break my usual custom and propose on Thursday instead of Saturday, Bess. I want you to work for, dear. It will be pretty hard camping out with the construction gang and working on the job with the field corps. I want to come back to camp every night and feel that I have done another good day's work for you."

"Work, like virtue, should be its own reward," paraphrased Bess. Sheldon shook his head impatiently.

"I know all that," he said, "but that sounds better than it works out. I want to feel that when the job is done and Groll & Sheldon become a firm of importance Mrs. Sheldon is proud of what her husband has done."

"I shall always be proud of what you do, Fred," reminded Bess. "We two are the only ones from the old town in all this big city. We have always been chums, and of course I shall be proud of your great achievements."

"That's not what I want," said Fred impatiently. "Of course I am going after this chance, no matter what, and I'll work as hard without your promise as with it, but it will lend sweetness to the labor, Bess, if you tell me that I may work for you.

"Won't you take a career by proxy, dear? Do you want to work to the end of your days and live the loveless life? Aren't there times when you want to give it all up and just stop worrying about checks that the publishers do not send and canvases that don't sell, though you know that they are as good as some that bring big money? Don't you tire of your career sometimes, and don't you feel as though it would be nice to let some one else do the worrying?"

"And if I do?" she asked, with an odd little note in her voice.

"Then let me carry the burden," he pleaded. "Let me do the planning for you. In six months from now I shall be at the top of the heap and making money, but you can make those six months of toil very pleasant, dear, if you will only listen to your heart and me."

"I have listened to you," she reminded, with a light laugh. "Why, Freddy, there has not been a Saturday night in more than a year that you have not urged me to marry you. I'd like to, dear, but there is my career."

"Does it all pay?" he demanded. "Is it worth all the worry and the contriving?"

"Perhaps," she said uncertainly, and Sheldon pressed the advantage.

"Wouldn't it be nice if you didn't have to scrimp and scrape and plan the spending of every penny?" he demanded. "Wouldn't it be nice to have a real home instead of a three room flat, to eat regular meals instead of chafing dish messes and to—well, to have me across the table every night instead of just Saturdays? It would be our own table, too," he reminded, "and not a table d'hote."

"Perhaps."

It was spoken so low that Sheldon had to lean across the table to catch the whispered word. But he did catch it, and his face beamed satisfaction.

"And you will marry me?" he cried delightedly.

This time he did not hear, but he knew that the coveted answer had been spoken, and he caught the hand that toyed nervously with the cup.

He spoke no word, for none was needed. Their eyes told each other messages that never have been put into words, spoke a language that only lovers know—and Sheldon was content.

It was Alphonse whose discreet but suggestive cough from the doorway leading to the main room recalled them to more earthly matters and an unpaid check. Sheldon drew a bill from his pocket and laid it upon the tray.

"Keep the change," he said, "and drink to our good fortune." Then Alphonse, helping him into his overcoat, assured his radiant customer in French and English that it should be done.

In Sansin's customers tipped half a dollar only when the worse for wine. Here was a man, to all appearances sober, who tipped 60 cents. Alphonse's thanks followed them even out upon the street, where Sheldon tucked Bess' arm into his own with a new air of proprietorship that the girl found very comforting.

"Fred," she whispered, "did you know that I was tired and depressed today?"

"I was only taking chances," he explained, with a happy laugh. "I thought it out last night when I was almost certain that Benny would put the deal through. I figured that you always felt as I did when you had money in your pocketbook on Saturdays—and that you'd feel as I do two days before pay day. It was worth taking a chance by changing the day."

Bess patted his arm affectionately. "I wish you had found that out before," she whispered. "It is only from Saturday to Tuesday that I cared about a career."

Cards and Their History.

Cards are square shaped pieces of pasteboard printed with various devices and employed as a business medium by money changers. They are usually made up in packs of fifty-two, one for each week of the year. A good many people play cards for pleasure, in which case their opponents are said to be buying experience. In most card games the rule is that the cards may be cut, but not otherwise marked. This rule is not strictly observed in games in which only three cards are used. Indeed, the marking of cards has attained a high degree of perfection since the introduction of numerous card index systems. Fashions change in card games as in everything else. Old maid, for instance, is nowadays seldom played in the best clubs. Playing cards should not be confused with those sold on cricket grounds, which are rather larger, or with visiting cards, which are smaller.—Fry's Magazine.

Doubtful Quality.

"I got some free advice from Dr. Closeface last night."

"How did you do it?"

"Caught him off his guard at a social gathering."

"My free advice to you would be not to take it."

Probably.

"Some people are so inquisitive."

"Yes, but they are usually stupid."

"Stupid?"

"Yes. If I were as inquisitive as you are I would know everything."

Inevitable Conclusion.

"My wife is not at all fond of society."

"Oh, she does, does she?"

"Does what?"

"Her own dressmaking."

BOWSER'S SURE THING

Returns Home Elated With the Conception of a Scheme.

WITH MILLIONS IN IT TOO.

He Will Raise Chestnuts—Sees $100,000 a Year In Project Until Mrs. B.'s Cold Facts Drive Him Into the Street.

[Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.]

At 3 o'clock the other afternoon an express wagon drove up to the Bowser residence, and the driver delivered a grain bag whose contents seemed to weigh about 200 pounds.

"There is probably some mistake about this," said Mrs. Bowser as she was called down to the basement door.

"Don't Samuel Bowser live here?" asked the man.

"Yes."

"Then there you are. Bowser lives here—Bowser gets his bag of chestnuts."

"Chestnuts!" gasped Mrs. Bowser. "Why on earth has he sent home a bag of chestnuts?"

"Can't say, my lady, as I am no Sherlock Holmes. Perhaps he's fond of roast chestnuts. I used to be myself until all my teeth dropped out. Chestnuts they are, and you must have it out with him when he comes home. I'm simply driving an express wagon and doing my humble duty as I see it. Sign there, please, and good day, ma'am."

Mrs. Bowser and the cook held a long and serious consultation as to why Mr. Bowser should send home a bag of chestnuts, but they could only guess and surmise. Nothing they could bring forward would untangle the mystery.

"All I know," said the cook as she returned to her pots and pans, "is that if them chestnuts are loaded I shall leave this house as soon as I can after finding it out. I don't want to leave you in the lurch, but a poor and innocent girl must protect herself from being blown so high that she'll be half an hour coming down again."

Mr. Bowser came home from the office at 6 with a light step and a smile on his face, and he executed a sort of dance in the hall after taking off his overcoat.

"You sent home a bag of chestnuts this afternoon," said Mrs. Bowser as they got seated at the dinner table.

"I did, my dear, and you were surprised?"

"Of course I was. We can't eat that many all winter. Shall I send a part of them to the Salvation Army?"

"Not this eve or any other eve."

"But what are we to do with them?"

"That's my secret—my surprise," he answered, with a chuckle. "You just wait until after dinner, and we'll have a talk. I've got the grandest, surest thing you ever heard of. I'm so excited it has taken my appetite away."

"But you've had so many schemes."

"Never mind what I have had. One has got to look around some before striking a big thing. When I say that you can go down tomorrow and buy furs and diamonds you must know how sure I am of my scheme."

"I hope it isn't a fire escape or burglar alarm."

"Nonsense! Don't take me for an idiot. I confess to having been taken in once or twice, but I'm a man that learns from experience. Sure thing this time—sure thing."

"And you haven't paid out much money to get it?" she haltingly asked.

"Just $5 for the bag of chestnuts. No more talk until we get upstairs."

It was twenty minutes later, when dinner had been finished and Mr. Bowser had got his cigar alight and was ready to say:

"Now, then, to make all clear to you. For twenty years I have been trying to strike a big thing."

"And spent lots of money foolishly."

"Only a few dollars, Mrs. Bowser. For twenty long years I have had my eyes open for a good thing. I have met with lots of discouragements, but I have struck it at last—struck it for fo—"

"In chestnuts?"

"In chestnuts, my dear. The chestnut is going to pull in gold and diamonds for the Bowser family. You are puzzled; you can't see it; you doubt. Very well. Let me say to you that chestnuts are worth $2.50 a bushel at wholesale. That means a dollar and a half more at retail. Understand?"

"Yes."

"A chestnut tree yields an average of ten bushels of nuts per year. That's $25 at wholesale. One hundred trees mean a sure crop of $2,500 a year, doesn't it?"

"It appears to."

"Appears! Appears! Why, woman, can't you figure for yourself? It's as plain as our old yaller eyed cat asleep on the rug there. One thousand chestnut trees mean a sure crop of $25,000 a year, and you can't figure it any other way. Suppose we make it 5,000 trees and an annual income of $100,000? Any objections to that, old girl?"

"And what is your plan?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

"Need I state it? Can't you see? I sell the house and go into chestnut growing. Simple as A B C, and no one has ever thought of it before—a gold mine right under their feet, and people have been walking over it. Well, will you go down and order your diamonds?"

Mrs. Bowser walked over to the bookcase and took down an encyclopedia and began to turn the leaves.

"What's up now?" was asked.

"I wanted you to make sure of your ground."

"But I am sure. You need waste no time poking your nose into musty old books. I sent to Tennessee for that bag of chestnuts and shall plant them as soon as spring opens."

Cold Facts Handed Bowser.

"That's what I was looking for, and here it is. A chestnut tree does not come into full bearing until twenty years after planting. No chestnut tree bears a crop every year. In the last decade thousands of trees of this species have been killed by a sort of teredo that bores into the heart of them. There are but few chestnut groves in the United States. In making such groves the rule is thirty trees to the acre. Sit down, Mr. Bowser, and we will figure a little."

"There you go!" he shouted in answer. "What in thunder do we want to figure for? I say it's a big thing—better than a gold mine."

"I hope so, but let us see. You start with 5,000 trees. You must have at least 165 acres of land for them. You will have to hire help from the day you begin planting."

"I knew it! I knew you'd do your best to discourage me!"

"But I'm not. I'm only trying to arrive at facts. The average yield of a chestnut tree is not five bushels, instead of ten. That cuts your estimate in two."

"Hear her! Hear her!" shouted Mr. Bowser as he shuffled around.

Chestnuts Vary In Price.

"Then how are we to live for the twenty years? A part of your trees are sure to die within the first two or three years, and the borer may attack those that reach a half growth. Again, you can't always figure on the price of chestnuts. There are some years when the worms destroy a whole crop. Have you taken these things into consideration?"

"Madam, are you talking to me?" asked Mr. Bowser as he drew himself up as stiff as a crowbar.

"Of course I am. Have you selected the site for your grove yet? Have you made arrangements to live for the next twenty years without an income? Have you"—

But Mr. Bowser was down the hall putting on his overcoat, and before she could reach him he was out on the step and had banked the door behind him. He walked straight to his family drug store, and, finding the druggist at leisure for the moment, he poured the chestnutty tale into his open ear. He was listened to without interruption, and when he had finished the druggist stepped behind the counter and poured out a dose of something into a graduating glass.

"What is it?" asked Mr. Bowser as it was offered to him.

"Something for cold feet. Drink it and go home and go to bed. Yours is a more serious case than you dream of."

IMPROVED PIPE WRENCH.

With It Firm Grip Can Be Secured on Round Surfaces.

The wrench illustrated herewith is formed with a slidable jaw which enables it to grip round surfaces. No retaining pins or other detachable retaining devices are used and an efficient pipe wrench is thus provided with few loose parts. Formed on the main body A of the wrench is a fixed jaw B. Dovetailed into opposite sides of the body are a pair of detachable racks C, which are adapted to mesh with the thread of the nut D. This nut is fitted in a frame E, which in turn is mounted to slide along the body or shank of the wrench. The frame E is extended at one side, and in the inclined upper face of this extension an undercut guideway is formed adapted to receive the slidable jaw F. A spring-pressed pin in the jaw bears against the shank A, and holds the jaw in its outermost position. In use the nut D is adjusted to close the jaws onto the work, and then when the wrench is operated, the sliding jaw moves inward, jamming the work against the upper jaw. Mr. Harvey N. Rothweller of Seattle, Wash., says the Scientific American, is the inventor of this improved wrench pipe.

HUGE LENS ON MOUNTAIN TOP.

Most Powerful Telescope in the World Ready for Service in December.

The huge 2,000-pound lens for the Carnegie Solar observatory is at last on top of Mount Wilson after one of the most tedious and nerve-racking tasks of the kind ever undertaken.

The first stage of the undertaking, which was the feat of transporting the immense casting from a little village near Paris, to Pasadena, was concluded three years ago when the cast was turned over to an expert optician to be ground and polished into a state of perfection.

After three years of incessant grinding and polishing, which ended in August, the finished lens was turned over to the chief astronomer of the observatory, and the third and final stage of the undertaking was entered into.

This was to lift the dead weight of a ton, which the touch of a hand might mar, to the height of a mile up a steep, rough mountain side. Mingled with the anticipation which scientific men felt at the outset of the triumphant ascension was a feeling of anxiety lest the ponderous yet delicate problem should fail. There were innumerable chances that disaster would overtake the expedition. If the lens had been broken or cracked, or had the slightest accident caused a flaw to appear upon its surface, though microscopically minute, the undertaking would have been a failure. Such a failure would not have been measured in dollars alone; indeed, the money cost would be classed as trivial compared with the all-important element of time, as five years of incessant labor would be required to replace it.

The old trail up Mount Wilson was out of the question. For several miles it is only three feet wide. It was necessary, therefore, to construct a new trail, and a large force of men were put to work on a route which seemed to promise the surest means of transportation. The trail was completed at a great cost, the lens was securely buried in soft packing material, and after an entire day of most tedious work was at last deposited in the observatory.

The finished lens is 60 inches across, 8 inches thick at the point of its extreme fullness, and weighs an even 2,000 pounds. It is so much more powerful than any other lens that it is claimed it will make visible 200,000,000 more stars than can be seen with the most efficient instrument now in place. The atmosphere at the mountain top is particularly suited to astronomical observations and the instrument will have the further advantages of the most complete and modern supplemental equipment.

catgut—a string used on a violin will do—is suspended from the bent end of the wire. A hand or pointer is cut from a piece of tin and secured to the catgut string about one-half inch from the base. A small piece of wood and some glue will fasten the pointer to the string. The scale is marked on a piece of cardboard, which is fastened to the base and protected with a piece of glass.

RAGS BRIDAL GIFT

ACCEPTABLE PRESENT FOR THE YOUNG MATRON.

Scrapbag for Emergencies Was the Idea of a Wise Mother—Really Good Sense Marks Such an Offering.

The spic and spanness of the average trousseau leaves no place for a piece bag. Everything is new, and in a house otherwise well supplied the young matron is often at a loss to find a piece of linen to staunch a wound or a scrap of muslin to stay his buttons.

The sisters of a recent bride were amused to find their mother collecting old rolls of muslin, odd bits of linen, remnants of calico, and even ends of old stockings to send across the continent to a newly married pair.

The family remonstrances as to "waste of expressage on rags" had no effect. The older housekeeper knew that the young one, with her fine table linen, bed clothing and lingerie, could have no more welcome gift in that distant city than that despised scrapbag for emergencies.

Another seasoned housekeeper gives to every bride-to-be among her friends what she calls "The Bride's Friend." It is nothing more than an elaborate patch bag, but proves the most popular kind of an engagement present.

She makes a large laundry bag of art linen in some bright color, binds it with white linen tape, supplies it with several pockets, inside and out, and embroiders on the front the initials of the recipient.

The bag is then stocked with scrub cloths, pieces of muslin for ironing boards, covers for pots and pans, several yards of gray canton flannel for wiping up floors, chamois skins, rolls of old muslin and linen and good sized pieces of silk and cloth.

The fame of this odd gift has been spread by enthusiastic young housekeepers, who have found it a delight to have a supply on which to draw before time provides them with "rags" of their own.

NEW AND IMPROVED DUSTER.

Cloth That Absorbs the Fine Particles of Dirt.

You can now dust rooms without leaving a trail of dust which refuses to be gathered up on the cloth when you wipe furniture and bric-a-brac. The magic duster is merely a dark colored cloth which apparently absorbs instead of dissipates the fine particles of dirt, and it is sold in almost all the department shops, as well as in places where household conveniences are offered to the public. By treating the square of cheesecloth or soft cotton cloth with chemicals it becomes a duster of extraordinary qualities. To be sure a queer odor of chemicals clings to the cloth, but one can stand this for the sake of being able to really wipe up the dust instead of making it fly from one place to another. After enough dust has collected on the cloth to prevent its absorbing more particles it can be cleansed in warm water and soap, dried quickly on a heater and then it is ready for another room or to finish the one already partially dusted. These wonderfully convenient and serviceable affairs are quite inexpensive, the smaller size costing but a few cents.—New York Herald.

With Every Frock a Flower.

The fad for wearing artificial posies with the evening frock has returned with a vengeance, and all the shops are showing natural-looking roses, lily-of-the-valley sprays, gardenias, orchids and violet clusters, ready to pin to the bodice. These made-to-order flowers are, however, not an economy, for in most cases the price runs far above that of an ordinary blossom of the same kind. The artificial flower, of course, has the advantage of keeping its usefulness far beyond the brief beauty of the real blossom.

In massaging wrinkles use the tips of the fingers and thumb, always working across the line; never follow the lines of creases.

Washing the eyes morning and night in water as hot as it can be borne is a wonderful tonic for those useful servants which are so easily injured.

When a child is restless from teething it can often be quieted by giving it a warm bath. The water should be as hot as can be endured without burning. Do not allow the child to stay in the bath long or weakness will follow.

To reduce the hips stand up straight and by bending forward make the fingertips touch the floor. Do not wear tight clothing and do not bend the knees. This is an old exercise, known as the "setting-up" exercise, and is much used in the army for this purpose.

Often when one has a cold the eyes feel hot and are red and inflamed. The best way to effect a cure is to bathe the eyes frequently with a solution of boric acid and water. If the eyes do not feel improved after your cold disappears it would be well to consult an oculist.

STATE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY MEETING

Senator Brown Announces the Summer Meeting of the Society at Mt. Lake.

To the Editor of The Republican:

DEAR SIR: I would like to call the particular notice of your readers to the announcement of the Summer Meeting of the Maryland State Horticultural Society at Mt. Lake Park, on Saturday, July 31st, beginning at 10 a. m.

Every resident of Garrett county is cordially invited to attend. In our county practically every farmer is an horticulturist, and will profit by these meetings.

The coming of our friends from the Eastern Shore, and other parts of Maryland at this time, in part a recognition by them of the share which Garrett county has recently taken in the work of the Society, and of our two recent fine displays of fruit, at the Annual Exhibits in Baltimore. It is for us acknowledge this countesy by turning out in full force at these meetings and show that we have interest in horticulture, and are alive to our advantages.

Don't forget July 31st. Bring all the ladies. Yours truly

W. MCCULLOH BROWN,
Pres. Md. S. H. S.

Oakland, Md., July 19, 1909.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. KITURA GOSS.

Died, at her home in Oakland, Saturday, July 19th, Mrs. Kitura Goss, wife of Mr. Frank F. Goss, aged 49 years, 6 months and 27 days. The deceased was a daughter of the late William and Jane Kline, of Clearfield county, Pa., and was married to her now bereaved husband twenty-nine years ago. She is survived by her husband, ten children and four grandchildren, namely: Oscar K., of Lead Mine, W. Va.; Mrs. M. C. Thompson, of Crellin; Guy, of West Virginia; Ellsworth, William, Clara Jane, Paul B., Francis F., Joseph, Ira and Edna, at home in Oakland. Mrs. Goss was a member of the Baptist church. She became a Christian and joined the church of her choice at the early age of sixteen years. As a wife, mother, christian and neighbor she was highly esteemed by those who knew her best. Now that she "rests from her labors her works will follow." Good deeds never die. "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him." The sympathies of the community is extended to the sorrowing husband and the motherless children. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. M. Davis, assisted by Rev. Edmund Manges, at the home of the deceased lady on Oak atreet and the interment was made in the Oakland cemetery.

The entire family desire to express their thanks to the friends and neighbors for the many acts of kindness rendered during the sickness of the departed wife and mother. D.

Midsummer Meteors.

Astronomers are expecting early displays of the beautiful Perseid meteors which illuminate the midsummer skies. Among all the meteor streams which pass through portions of the earth's atmosphere that radiating from a point near the constellation, Perseus is the principal and the most regular in its conspicuous recurrence. They have been watched for centuries and periods of their visibility is extensive. They range from July 8 to August 22. The Perseids, Aquarids and other showers are visible, affording abundant material for vigilant observers until the third week in August. While much attention has been already given by astronomers to these vast meteoric streams, it is still important that observers should carefully note the apparent paths of all the brightest fireballs during the approaching display.

German Lutheran Church.

The Lutheran synod of Missouri and other States, Saturday decided to merge its identily with the German Lutheran Synod, covering the United States, Canada and some foreign countries, from which it separated 28 years ago. Rules of the German synod against the use of the English language in services or synod meeting, which brought about the separation, have been rescinded.

There are 600,000 people in the German synod and about 25,000 in the synod of Missouri, which also includes Mississippi, North Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Massachuetts, New Jersey, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Indiana. The Missouri synod will partially maintain its idenity by forming a seperate district of the German synod.

The presenc action is subject ratification by a majority of the congregations interested. The doctrinal paper of the synod, which is its authoritative document, declares for complete separation of church and State in this connection and critices the appointment of army, navy, and congressional chaplains by the Federal Government.

WATER RUNNING LOW.

A Recurrence of Last Fall's Dry Weather Probable.

The late months of last summer and the early months of the fall witnessed the driest weather ever experienced in this section of the country, as wells and springs never before known to dry up were as barren of water as the Sahara Desert.

A recurrence of this condition is now threatened the residents of Oakland as wells have become entirely dry and others are extremely low, especially those located in the higher portions of the town. Last fall when the water was at its lowest more or less sickness ensued and this is feared will follow the present state of weather should it continue, which is one of the possibilities.

Randolph--Tucker Boundary Line

The work of running the boundary line between Tucker and Randolph counties, W. Va., has been completed and the result was that the old line was established. It had been overlooked and the Perley and Cockett Lumber Co. has been paying taxes in Tucker county when their plant is just across the line in Randolph county. Their taxes amount to something over $1,000 per year and Tucker county has been collecting taxes from them for the past five years.

Black Hand Blamed for Murder.

The body of Dominick Bertaldi, an Italian stone cutter employed at the I. N. Weaver quarries, Kingwood, W. Va., was found in the woods near Kingwood under circumstances which indicate he was killed by the Black Hand. The corpse was discovered by two little girls who were out in search of flowers. The body was badly decomposed.

A jury impaneled by Coroner David Gibson decided that Bertaldi come to his death from a gash in the neck. A razor was found by his side which was not the property of the dead man.

A few weeks ago the stonecutters employed at the Weaver quarries went out on strike, but a few of them remained, including Bertaldi. The men who remained at work were threatened with death in letters signed by the Black Hand. Bertaldi left his boarding house July 4 and was not seen again until his body was found.

Bertaldi was about 40 years old. He is survived by three children in Pittsburg, his wife having died some time ago. He has a brother in Gassaway.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

During the present week residents and visitors have been treated to the finest moving pictures obtainable, every evening witnessing a change of program. Monday night the initial show was given when we were made acquainted with many of the heretofore rather hazy movements in the life of General George Washington. By use of the moving pictures great things accomplished by America's patriot have been indelibly impressed upon the minds of all who were peesent. Tuesday evening many of the stirring scenes in the life of Napoleon and Josephine were shown, and last night a story of the great Civil War was reproduced on the canvas. Tonight the Zoological Gardens of London, the most wonderful of their kind in the world, will be depicted. Tomorrow night and Saturday night the series of pictures will be continued.

Next week, until well toward the close, we shall have a restful space, as nothing will intervene in the way of public entertainments until the opening of the State Horticultural Society. Upon this occasion many things of importance to agriculture and horticulture will be discussed and the very practical program arranged by the president of the Society, Senator W. McCulloh Brown, will be carried out.

Some changes in the mode of arranging the wires of the C. & P. Telephone Company are being made through the Park, the object being to group the service wires in order to overcome the great amount of induction caused by the proximity of the electric light lines, which has been an annoyance and almost entirely placed the service out of commission after the current is turned on at night.

At the meeting of the Inter-State Good Roads Conference to be held immediately after the close of the Chautauqua season this year, a plan will probably be outlined and the preliminaries arranged for the building of a Shoemaker road between Oakland and the Park, as indicated exclusively in your columns a few weeks ago. This road will be of lasting benefit and a source of pleasure to every resident of the county and every visitor to this section having occasion to travel between the two towns. Under the Shoemaker plan of building roads curves and grades are eliminated where possible, the roadway widening where traffic demands it and the road built along scientific lines and costing the county but forty per cent. of its contract price. The building of such a road will not only be a source of great pleasure to the people but will greatly enhance the value of every piece of property in both towns and the lands adjacent to it. Let the good road movement spread until every portion of Garrett county shall have the main highways in a state of perfection.

Numerous visitors are reaching the Park daily from both east and west and as a result the hotels and boarding houses are enjoying a splendid patronage.

Among those who have recently arrived here to spend the month of August are Mrs. W. H. Spedden and family of Fairmont; Mrs. Olin F. Durst and two children, of Lonaconing, and Mrs. Durst's mother, Mrs. Leah F. Sincell, of Oakland, who are occupying the Mrs. Byrne cottage; Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Bishop, of Terra Alta, and a number of others.

No abatement in the agitation for natural gas to be introduced in the Park is apparent. Our people want it, but they desire to have it on a fair and equitable basis and I trust that an amicable agreement may be reached between the representatives of the gas company and the Park committee when they meet to confer over the matter.

BITTINGER.

This week began with a steady breeze blowing out of the north and the temperature hovering dangerously near the frost line.

A traveler through this neighborhood could see the novel and interesting sight of a score or more of men busily engaged in cradleing, raking and binding wheat in a seventy-two acre field on the old Cunningham farm near this village. This large field is all ground recently cleared of timber and is therefore thickly dotted with stumps and the harvesting of the grain is impossible save in the old time way.

During last week five automobiles passed through this village en route to and from Oakland.

G. W. Engle and family, of Baltimore, came to this village last Monday for a short stay in the mountains.

School Commissioner George E. Bishoff, of Oakland, passed through this place last Monday morning.

Fred Miller, of Accident, was a business caller last Monday evening.

After spending a week with her sister at this place, Miss Dolly Winterburg returned to her home in Grantsville last Sunday.

Rev. J. B. Shoup is confined to his bed at the home of his daughter, Mrs. O. C. Buckle, and his many friends hope for his speedy recovery.

Miss Effie Bittinger, our agreeable "hello girl," is off duty this week on account of illness.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnificent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience; America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,000.00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and believe that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator s still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

NATURAL GAS IS ON TAP AND BURNING IN OAKLAND

Product of the Northern Natural Gas Co. Turned Into Mains Saturday

As exclusively forcasted in these columns last Thursday gas was turned into the Oakland mains of the Northern Natural Gas Company last Saturday afternoon and at the hour of 8.50 the same evening the first natural gas to be burned in Oakland was lighted at the residence of Mr. J. B. Cheuvront, the local superintendent of the company. Monday evening at the office of the company a large four mantle arc light was erected and has been kept burning night and day ever since. The brilliancy of the light is a revelation to the majority of the people of the town and all others who are unaccustomed to this mode of illumination.

Elsewhere in this paper today will be found the announcement of the gas company of its intention to give an exhibition on Saturday evening and also an invitation to all who desire to use gas to call at the office and make the proper arrangement.

The gentlemen connected with the gas company are courteous and obliging and their treatment of the public has been at all times extremely gratifying.

All who can should be in Oakland Saturday night to witness the illumination which is to occur that evening.

A TRUE BLUE REPUBLICAN

Will Give More Information Concerning Mr. Green Next Week.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN.

I have just learned that Mr. L. F. Green, aspirant for the House of Delegates, is having a circular printed in which he will attempt to show that the communication published in your paper last Thursday was not founded upon facts.

I have in preparation at this moment a communication for publication in THE REPUBLICAN next week and with it I will furnish absolute proof that Mr. Green was the author of the anti-Taft communications which appeared in the Garrett Journal last fall, signed Republican, dated at Grantsville and which Mr. Green is an evasive manner denied the authorship when he was approached upon the subject through a communication appearing in THE REPUBLICAN later.

The Republicans of Grantsville and the county at large may look for a revelation concerning Mr. Green and his methods.

GRAND COUNCIL Y. M. I.

A Three Days' Session Held in Oakland This Week.

The sessions of the Thirteenth Grand Council of the Young Men's Institute, a Catholic orginization with principles similar to those of the Y. M. C. A. of the Protestant churches, were concluded Tuesday afternoon after three days' deliberations on matters brought before the organization's representatives. The delgates to the convention numbered nearly a hundred and came from many parts of the country, the majority arriving here Sunday morning on a special train, being accompanied by the Midland Band and some four hundred or more excursionists from the Creek region of Allegany county. The excursion train returned Sunday evening.

The delegates to the council were tendered a ball at the Oakland Hotel Monday night by the young people of Oakland. The affair was well attended and was quite enjoyable.

The sessions of the council were held in the old Catholic church and just prior to adjournment Tuesday afternoon the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, A. L. Will, Frostburg; 1st vice president, H. Gahl, Reading, O.; 2nd vice president, F. P. Flanagan, Midland; secretary, P. F. Haberkorn, Cincinnati, O.; treasurer, George Daugherty, Wellston, O.; marshal, W. G. McNally, Zanesville, O.; chairman of directors, B. J. Byrnes, Eckhart; organizer and lecturer, Rev. Fr. Joseph P. Nolan, Lonaconing.

The next meeting of the council will be held in Cumberland.

The following resolutions were offered by a committee and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the Thirteenth Annual Grand Council of the Young Men's Institute do hereby tender our sincere thanks to the people of Oakland, and especially to the Rev. Fr. Connell, who took so much interest in our representatives during their stay in Oakland; we also thank the officers of the city of Oakland for their kindness to us; also the young ladies of Oakland and the near vicinity who made our visit a pleasant one; we thank our officers for the work done during the past year and especially our grand president who worked with interesting zeal for our order.

Resolved further, That we also thank the young men of Oakland, the Knights of St. John and the members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians.

Dawson's Condition Alarming.

Attorney General W. G. Conley has received word from Kingwood that ex-Governor Dawson, who had been at Richmond debt suit, was forced to return to his home at Kingwood because of illness and that a high temperature had worried his friends. A year ago last month, Governor Dawson was forced to go to Asheville for five months because of tuberculosis, but he had apparently regained his health and was feeling fine when he left Charleston about ten days ago. His friends believe the warm weather at Richmond affected him.

FACTIONS ARE WARRING IN LOCAL DEMOCRATIC CAMP

Bitter Feeling Engendered By Action of Chairman Hamill.

A telegram dated at Oakland July 26, and published as a special in the Baltimore American Tuesday sums up the situation in the Democratic ranks of Garrett county as follows:

The political situation is warming up in Garrett. The Democratic party of this county is engaged in one of the bitterest factional fights in its history. The faction known as the "regulars" is led by the Brownings, and the "insurgents" by the Hamills. The "insgents" say they are fighting for the control of the party in the county for the purpose of ousting the present school board, including the county examiner and the assistant state fish commissioner, R. T. Browning. They also want control of the other state offices in the county.

Several weeks ago G. S. Hamill, Jr., who happens to be chairman of the county committee, called the primaries for July 31, to elect delegates to the state and judicial conventions without consulting either of the other two members of the committee, R. T. Browning and William Miller. And in publishing the call the chairman ignored the party organ, the Mountain Democrat, advertising the primaries in the Garrett Journal, a paper that claims to be independent.

Mr. Browning, one of the members of the committee, has come out in an open letter denouncing the chairman, Mr. Hamill, for his arbitary methods, claiming that his action in dominating the committee caused the other member, William Miller, to resign. Since issuing the primary call, the leaders of the two factions have been traveling the county almost continually. They can be seen going to fro at nearly all hours of the night. The contest grows more bitter daily. Each faction has named a a full delegation, that of the regulars being Dr. E. H. Bartlett, Charles A. Deffenbaugh, editor of the Oakland Democrat, and J. J. Bender, while the insurgents have C. V. Guard, S. K. Schlossnagle and Thomas J. Browning.

There is a great deal of criticism of the Democratic party by the taxpayers for holding two sets of primaries, as it will be necessary for them to make another call to nominate the county ticket. The expenses of the election law are not only very heavy to the taxpayers of this county, but the cost of the primaries will almost equal that of the election. They claim that the Democratic party in holding two sets of primaries, has taken advantage of the taxpayers through the weakness of the primary election law.

May Meet at Mountain Lake Park.

Mr. H. C. Rockwell, associate pastor of the Brooklyn Tabernacle, Brooklyn, N. Y., was visiting here and in Mt. Lake Park for a few days last week. As the representative of the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, he was looking over the Park, surrounding grounds, hotels, boarding houses, etc., and obtaining data with a view to considering this locality as a convention meeting place for the Society in 1910. This Society held its convention at Put-In-Bay Island, Lake Erie, last year, covering a period of eight days, the attendance being nearly four thousand.

Mr. Rockwell expressed himself as highly pleased with the advantages and beauties of the Park as a religious convention place. He stated that the Society was considering several propositions to hold hold its convention elsewhere next year, but was of the opinion that if satisfactory arrangements could be made with the Park management the convention lasting a week or ten days, would be held at this place.

The attendance would hardly be less than two thousand, and in all likelihood reach four thousand. What this would mean to the community in a financial way might easily be summed up.

Mr. Rockwell intimated that there is a possibility of having the convention come here in September this year, it being largely a question of suitable dates, negotiations for which are now in progress, and should these not be satisfactory, Mt. Lake Park might in all probability be selected, if arrangements can be made with the association.

Mr. Rockwell is engaged in the lecture field, having lectured extensively throughout the country.

For House of Delegates.

Mr. William H. Jacobs, of District No. 11, as will be seen by reference to the head of our editorial page, has made announcement of his candidacy for the nomination for House of Delegates. Mr. Jacobs was a member of the House at the session of 1898 and made a good record. He was born and reared in Garrett county as was his father before him. He is extensively engaged in agricultural pursuits and is also a manufacturer of lumber. In business Mr. Jacobs has been eminently successful and with his past services as a legislator he comes before the people he wishes to represent well equipped for the position.

COL. PEARRE IS OUT OF THE JUDICIAL CONTEST

Not To Make Contest For Judgeship Nomination.

A special dispatch to the Baltimore Sun from Cumberland, July 24, says: Congressman George A. Pearre will not be a candidate for the Republican nomination for Chief Judge of the Fourth Judicial Circuit of Maryland. He will, therefore, not enter the primaries in Allegany county, which will be held August 14.

Congressman Pearre would have had until July 30 to announce himself had he intended to engage in the fight. A Republican leader in this county who is close to Congressman Pearre says an understanding has been reached whereby Congressman Pearre is to support D. Lindley Sloan for the Republican nomination for Chief Judge, and in return Mr. Sloan and his friends are to support Mr. Peerre in the primaries next year for renomination for Congress. Mr. Pearre has decided to go into the Congressional primaries again next year, according to this statement. Mr. Sloan has heretofore been allied with a faction opposed to Congressman Pearre. Against Mr. Sloan in the judicial primaries will be Charles G. Watson, of Frostburg, a member of the Cumoerland bar, but it is generally conceded that Mr. Sloan will win the delegation easily.

Mr. Sloan today gave to the press his formal announcement as a candidate for the judgeship. He is said to be in the new Wellington-Pearre political alignment which is supporting Zihlman for the State Senate. State's Attorney David A. Robb, who is regarded as the leader of the local option forces and is Mr. Sloan's warm backer and is associated with him in the same law office, is supporting Whitworth for the State Senate. An attempt is being made, it is stated, to concentrate the "wet" strength on Zihlman. It is stated that Congressman Pearre, who has always been strong in Garrett county, will attempt to throw the county to Sloan. With Allegany and Garrett behind him Sloan would be nominated.

Albert A. Doub, of the Cumberland bar, is being spoken of as a probable dark horse candidate for the judgeship, but it is not likely he will enter the race. Mr. Watson, who is making a vigorous fight, says the opposition is "talking wild" when it states that he will be beaten easily. He claims he will carry both Allegany and Garrett counties and that his strength in Garrett is growing daily despite Mr. Pearre's attempt to throw that county to Sloan.

Congressman Pearre, upon being asked if he thought a Republican could be elected to the office of chief judge of this circuit, said: "Why, of course I do, and I have no doubt that with a party and the sincere and loyal support by the party of the nominee of the judicial convention, a Republican can and should be elected by a substantial majority in the Fourth judicial circuit, composed of three unquestionably Republican counties. I know that appeals will be made to the citizenship of the circuit that the judgeship should not be affected by partisunship, and while this may be true it is equally true that such argument should appeal with equal force to both parties; but, unfortunately, we find that in practice our Democratic friends do not respond to this virtuous appeal, but elect Democratic judges whenever they can. In my humble judgment it is high time that the Republicans of this circuit should come into their own again by the election of a Republican judge, and as earnest of the sincerity of this conviction I shall use my best endeavors to aid in bringing about the election of the nominee of the Republican judicial convention for this circuit."

It is reported that Congressman Pearre will take a hand in the coming primaries for county nominations in this county and will endeavor to have a ticket named by direct vote that will include as many of his friends as possible. It is known that he is anxious to see Fred N. Zihlman, former State president of the Federation of Labor and the present head of the Allegany Trades Council, the nominee for State Senator.

Mr. Zihlman always took an active hand for Colonel Pearre in his fights and he did much toward securing for the latter an indorsement of organized labor through Samuel Gompers. It is stated that were Mr. Gompers in this country he would come here to aid Mr. Zihlman in his fight. Harry T. Mullin, another aspirant for the Senatorial nomination, was a warm backer of Col. Pearre in his last Congressional contest. Mr. Mullin has expressed his displeasure over the Congressman's activity for Mr. Zihlman. Mr. Mullin is out openly against the local option movement, while Mr. Zihlman and Dr. Timothy Griffith, of Frostburg, another aspirant, are noncommittal on the subject, while Horace P. Whitworth, who is backed by Mr. Lloyd Lowndes, is in favor of submitting the question of the existence of saloons to a vote of the people.

It it understood that Mr. W. Bladen Lowndes, brother of Lloyd Lowndes, and appointed a member of the State Central Committee by the latter, is in favor of Dr. Griffith. It is reported that the State Central Committee, which is composed of friends of Mr. Lloyd Lowndes, is pretty evenly divided between the two candidates, Messrs. Whitworth and Griffith. Mr. Whitworth has the indorsement of the Anti-Saloon League, while the "wet" strength will be divided among the otner three. Mr. Whitworth's friends think he has a good show as a result. Mr. Zihlman's friends are counting on his labor strength to pull him through. Both Mr. Mullin and Dr. Griffith have large personal followings and factional alignments have entirely changed.

Ex-Senator George L. Wellington is still taking a hand in county politics and his advice is much sought. He and Congressman Pearre are in harmony and have been working hand in hand. John L. Wellington, the only son of Senator Wellington, from all indications will be the nominee for County Treasurer, without opposition. So far no one has appeared in the field against him. Young Mr. Wellington is teller in the Citizens' National Bank, of which his father is founder and president. He is a Princeton graduate and the possesser of a most pleasing personality. He is of domestic tastes and spends a greater portion of his time in his home with his wife and two children. Mr. Wellington is 31 years of age. His banking experience has given him splendid training for the duties of the position which he seeks.

THE DEATH RECORD.

DAVID S. ARNOLD.

Died, at his son's residence near Red House, this county, on Friday, the 23rd inst., David S. Arnold, aged 81 years and 5 months. The funeral service was held on last Sunday at the Red House church, Rev. P. J. Wade officiating. Rev. Wade delivered a very impressive sermon from II Timothy, 6, 7, 8. "For I am now ready to be offered and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me on that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love his appearing." The deceased was a consistent member of the Lutheran church for about thirty-five years, and was a regular attendant at all church services. He leaves an aged widow; one son, Frank, and three daughters, namely, Mrs. Fred Stahl, of near Sunnyside, Mrs. Willet, near Oakland, and Mrs. Harry Helbig, of Oakland. His life was that of a devout, exemplary Christian, and he died trusting in the promise of his Savior. His remains were followed to the grave by a large concourse of sorrowing relatives and friends. The pall-bearers were Messrs. M. S. Wolf, Jonas Yutzy, Jackson Baker, F. A. Chase, David Mosser and J. T. Moon. H.

MRS. MARTHA MITCHELL.

Mrs. Marthr Mitchell, mother of Mrs. John Ault, of Oakland, died in Pittsburg, where she has been residing for a number of years, on Friday morning of last week, of paralysis, aged eighty-two years. The deceased lady was stricken more than four weeks ago and gradually grew weaker until the end came. Her funeral took place from her late home Monday morning and was attended by a large concourse of friends and relatives. Among those who were present at the services from Oakland were Mr. and Mrs. John Ault, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Hinebaugh and Mr. and Mrs. William G. Hinebaugh.

JAMES JENNINGS HINEBAUGH.

James Jennings, aged five months, son of Mr. and Mrs. William G. Hinebaugh, died Tuesday night at eleven o'clock of bronchial pneumonia after an illness of three days. The funeral will occur this morning from the home on Second street. Mr. and Mrs Hinebaugh have the sincere sympathy of a large circle of friends.

DONALD KING BUSH.

Donald King, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. J. Ernest Bush, died this morning at six o'clock of whooping cough, with which the child was taken but a few days ago. The child was extremely ill from the moment it was taken sick and its death came as a distinct shock to the parents who have the sympathy of the community.

BARN AND CONTENTS WERE BURNED THURSDAY

Property of Lieut. E. S. West Near Oakland Completely Destroyed.

The large and exceedingly well arranged barn on the property of Lieut. E. S. West, adjoining Oakland on the north, was completely destroyed by fire of an unknown origin last Thursday afternoon between the hours of two and three o'clock.

At the time of the fire Lieut. West was down in the lower section of the county on business and his family had no intimation of the destruction that was being wrought until a young pig, which was penned beneath the burning barn rushed toward the house, followed a little later by its mate, both being somewhat burned, one more seriously than the other. The alarm was sent to Oakland over the telephone and it was but a very few moments later until a hundred or more men were on their way in automobiles, horseback and by other conveyances to the scene of the fire, which by this time had assumed such proportions as to preclude the possibility of saving anything aside from the fences adjacent and buildings standing nearby. This was accomplished by the use of a few buckets of water and an axe in the hands of one of the fire fighters.

In the barn and consumed along with it was a new carriage, new harness, bridles, saddles, etc., small farm machinery and other implements. Lieut. West regrets very much the loss of his army saddle which he rode during the Philippine war and which he valued very highly.

The building was worth $2000, upon which was an insurance of but $500.

Already men are at work on Lieut. West's place preparing for the erection of a larger barn to replace the one burned.

AN OPEN LETTER

To the Republican Voters of Garrett County.

At the earnest solicitation of the leading Republicans of my district I have decided to adopt this as one of the means to announce my candidacy for the House of Delegates which will convene at Annapolis next winter. In seeking a nomination at the hands of the Republican party I think it just to the members of that party to state what I stand for, should I be nominated and elected, in the matter of needed legislation for the county at the coming session of the General Assembly of Maryland:

First, fellow farmers and taxpayers, I stand for the betterment of the roads that we haul our produce and drive our stock upon to market. To do this my experience teaches me that the Brown law should be repealed and enact a measure into law that will meet the pressing need of the farmers and all others who use our county roads. The betterment of the roads leading to our markets should be greatest care of the farmers. I am not in any manner opposed to the building of state highways; let the good work go on; make more and longer roads.

Second, I stand for the enactment of a measure into law that can and will be enforced that will foster and protect the sheep industry, which is the best source of income the farmer has, and this is especially true in Garrett county, if the worthless dogs that are now allowed to run at large can be controlled.

Third, I shall hold myself ready and willing to assist my associates in bringing forward the very best measures for the county, especially in curtailing our election and court expenses, which seems to have grown out of proportion to the increase of our assessment basis.

Fourth, I make the modest claim to have studied the needs of the farmer and am willing to learn more of the interests of my constituency, should I be nominated and elected to a seat in the House of Delegates where in the past I have served twice honorably and faithfully, bringing credit and standing to my constituents.

Fellow farmers and taxpayers, I ask for your support in the primaries and convention.

GEORGE L. MICHAELS.

A Method of Eradicating the Wild Onion.

The Office of Farm Management, United States Department of Agriculture, has now ready for distribution a circular giving a detailed discussion of the wild onion problem and outlining a plan wherbey the pest can be exterminated. This circular will be sent free to any person requesting it.

UNREST IN INDIA ADDS TO BRITAIN'S BURDEN

The People of England's Greatest Possession Dissatisfied.

It has been slightly over a century and a half since England came into general control of India, and during the first century of that time her rule was marked by uprisings and mutinies. One prolific source of these rebellions was the fact that she farmed out her sovereignty to a private corporation, the East India company. Like all private corporations, the East India company looked out for its own selfish ends and had little concern for the interests of Britain and still less for the welfare of India. In the last great mutiny, in which Cawnpur was lost to the British and a general massacre of whites followed which respected neither age nor sex, the home government learned the great lesson that public concerns should be looked after by public agencies, abolished the East India company and made the government of its greatest and most populous province directly responsible to the crown. Since the inauguration of the new and wiser policy the revolts in India have been of a minor character and relations have been more nearly amicable.

The recent murder of Sir William Curzon Wyllie, an assistant in the Indian office in London, by Mahar Lal Dhingari, an Indian student, has aroused fears that the days of the mutinies might return. Dhingari not only killed Colonel Wyllie, but Dr. Cawas Lalcaca of Shanghai. But this was not intended, according to the assassin's story, Dr. Lalcaca meeting his death only because he interfered. The act was the more surprising in that Colonel Willie had always been a warm friend of India, had devoted a lifetime to an attempt to befriend the natives and give them a larger share in the government and was at the time of death the right hand man of Lord John Morley, the secretary for India, whose policy has been so liberal in giving the Hindoos a larger share of home rule that he has aroused a storm of criticism in England. Yet Dhingari declares that his purpose was to free India and he thought a step toward this end could be taken by striking down some prominent Britisher. Like many of the India students in London, he is known to have imbibed anarchist principles and to have been a follower of Krishnavarma's "Indian Sociologist," which preaches revolutionary doctrines, and revolutionary doctrines backed by force. The Indian student body in London has disavowed Dhingari's act, but this it would naturally do as a matter of self protection. The thing that most concerns the London government is the fear that not only other students, but native sentiment, is in sympathy with the assassin's principles and that his deed is a portent of disorders to follow.

While the general opinion is that Dhingari's act was that of a madman to which no special importance should be attached, there are certain elements in the Indian situation that are disquieting to Britain. It is a growing conviction of sociologists that behind every manifestation of political unrest is an economic cause, and this is especially the case in India. Through England's policy the bulk of native manufactories have been supplanted, thousands have been thrown out of employment, and India has thus been weakened and impoverished for the gain of British factory owners. Not only so, but the old system of storing grain in good years, against the seasons of famine has been wiped out, and the horrors of the inevitable famines have been greatly increased in consequence. These are the two crying grievances of the Hindoos against English rule.

For the mere political sovereignty of an alien power the middle and lower Indian castes care but little. Long accustomed to subjection to the upper caste, they know nothing of liberty and self government and hence, so long as they are left to follow the ways of their fathers, are concern little as to the particular power that exercises lordship over them. But when their work and livelihood are disturbed, when their very caste system is broken through the throwing out of employment of thousands belonging to some certain trade, they are not so complacent. When, in addition, the stores of grain are depleted and the constant shadow of death by famine is thus made deeper they are yet more disquieted. It is in these economic changes that the causes of Indian unrest among the masses are to be sought. As for the upper caste, it has always resented British rule for the reason that it has concerned itself with politics and therefore considers that its own peculiar realm has been invaded. From this element most of the mutinies of the past have come. But without the co-operation of the lower castes it has been handicapped.

A third sourse of unrest has now been added in the small but powerful contingent of Hindoos that are receiving European education, or education in native schools that are modeled on European lines. These enlightened young men have inevitably imbibed the ideas of modern democracy, and some of them have even espoused socialism and anarchism. It is to this number that Dhingari belongs.

One significant fact is that London takes a pessimistic view of the situation. England is just now in a gloomy mood over a number of things, however, and her forbodings as to India may be only a part of this general attitude.

The one bright spot in the outlook, from the British viewpoint, is that Lord Morley is still at the helm, and despite this assassination is going forward firmly to liberalize and humanize the English rule in India.

ROAD DRAG SEASON.

Any Month If the Conditions Are Right For Its Use.

The road drag is like the manure spreader—in style any month in the year if the condition are right for its use. Other machines are put in the shed to wait their season, but the road drag should always be ready to hitch to if we are to use it to the best advantage. The accepted time for the use of the drag is when the roads are drying up after the rains. It is surprising what an immense amount of good can be done the roads in an hour at such a time. Enough dirt is brought in to keep the road well rounded up, the water is allowed to run off, and the mud is puddled and plastered down so that the surface is quickly dried and compacted ready to shed the next shower a little better. Some people seem to have a wrong conception of the time to drag. I have seen one of our trustees out earning (?) the township money after the roads had been dry a day or two. He seemed to think the mission of the drag was to fill up the ruts. At any rate he would drive merrily along, leaving in some places hardly a track among the clods.

About the most satisfaction we ever realized from dragging the roads came from a job done in the mud just before the last freeze in the fall. How can you tell when to do it? Just guess at it and keep trying. If it thaws the next day there is no harm done. And when you do hit it you surely feel like a public benefactor as you watch the teams go gliding by on your pavement to bring up with a bump on your neighbor's rough road. The spring is the time to use the road drag if you want to do some lasting good to the highway. The dirt is soft and easily worked then, and a few trips over the road with the drag, cleaning out the ditches and rounding up the surface, will do more good than a gang of men with the grader in the fall. The best job I ever did with the drag was to round up the track on a bad clay hill just as the frost was going out. That hill was good all summer.—C. J. Kelsey in Homestead.

The Outsider

Morton was surprised to find Ella waiting for him at the door. He noticed that she was prettily gowned and that her cheeks were flushed. He hesitated a moment, then kissed her as usual. In return, she gave him the customary little pat on the shoulder.

He removed his overcoat without speaking. She did not break the silence. There was a cheerful fire in the library grate, and Morton instinctively went there and fell into his easy chair. The woman followed, taking her place on the low stool at his side.

"It is the last night," said the man, handing her a dainty box, "and I have brought you some violets."

She took the box and brought forth the flowers with an exclamation of delight. She buried her face in the blue-purple blossoms. Morton gazed into the fire.

"It is the last night," said the woman, after a time, "and I have made you something."

She rose and crossed to the far corner of the grate, bringing back a pair of homely, red-knit slippers.

"They are ugly enough," she remarked, "but very comfy; and the old ones are full of holes."

Morton smiled.

"Thank you," he muttered. "I shall wear them to-night, after dinner."

There was a ring at the door.

"Grace Channing dropped in town to-day," she explained hurriedly, "And of course I had to ask her in to dinner."

The man frowned.

"You see, Grace—Oh, I couldn't get out of it, you know; though I should have liked this last night to ourselves, —now that everything is over, and—"

The second ringing of the bell interrupted. With a flutter, the woman hurried to the door.

Miss Channing, knowing the situation, naturally was embarrased. She was a rather beautiful young woman, reputed to be clever. She had known both of her hosts before their marriage, and had been the first to take dinner with them after that event. It seemed now subtly tragic that she should also be the last.

But Miss Channing found no reflection of this spirit in her friends. Despite the cleverness of their guest, it was they who kept the atmosphere cleared and conversation interesting. The dinner was good—Ella had prepared it herself—and everywhere there were touches of the young wife's individuality. Also, here and there, were things that bore evidence of being Morton's choice. These two blended little, it seemed to Miss Channing; and she was deeply moved with the pathos of the end, now at hand.

In the little library, Morton again took his easy chair; and Ella sat beside him, while Miss Channing remained apart, an onlooker. Morton put on his new slippers and toasted them by the fire.

Miss Channing wondered, yet knew. There could be no reason, save positive difference in temperament. Presently she hurried away, and the two were left alone.

The night wore on. They spoke little. Always their remarks were pleasant, and both laughed. The fire died. Finally they retired.

In his room, Morton looked long at the home-made slippers. Meanwhile, Ella, in her own apartments, was gazing at a great bunch of violets.

II.

Dusk was come, and the shop windows were bright. It was early spring-time; so early that a chill wind, sweeping down the street, caused a tall, dark man standing beside a window to shiver and draw his coat-collar close about him. As he did so, a woman, hurrying along the sidewalk, glanced at the window, stopped suddenly, and then hurried up to him.

"It is surely you!" she cried, holding out her hand, gladly.

"Yes. And you have not changed, Ella," said the man, simply.

"No—o?" she returned.

She was looking questioningly into his deep brown eyes.

"How tanned you are!" she commented. "And—stooped. Have you been well?"

There was a note of anxiety in her voice which the woman would have hidden.

"Not unwell," he answered, smiling a trifle. "I have just returned from the tropics. Feels cold here. it's the tropic sun has given me this coat of brown. Seems like—home—to be back."

"Yes—yes?" said Ella, quickly. "I suppose—yes, I suppose so."

She felt her cheeks flush. She wondered if he could see her, if the light from the window fell upon her face.

"You have been away five years," she murmured; and regretted that she spoken.

"Yes," he answered in low tones; "and it has seemed longer. Do you know, Ella, after all there's nothing like a woman, an American woman?"

Under the great furs, her heart was thumping wildly.

"I think I've been learning, these five years."

He paused.

"It's a long time in which to—learn," she agreed, gently.

"Yes, a long time. I've learned that a man needs a woman; yes, I'm sure of that. A nice, good, whole-souled American girl—"

"Yes?"

"Something—well, like you, Ella."

Could he hear that little heart beneath the furs? She wondered. She murmured something; what, she knows not.

"I'm going to try it again, Ella; going to try it all over."

"I hope you will be happy," she exclaimed; then corrected herself: "Happier."

For a moment he did not speak.

"I know we shall be happy," he said. "I think she is a very sweet, big-hearted woman. I know she will try to make me worthy of her love. God knows I'm not!"

Again he stopped. The form before him was trembling, the face was hot with blushes, and the little heart was pounding joyously, pounding, pounding. A woman came from the door behind them and joined the two.

"Grace!" cried Ella. "It's been ages since I've seen you! I'm so happy to-night—to see you, I mean."

Miss Channing returned her greeting warmly, but with evident embarrassment. Meanwhile, Morton was saying:

"Grace and I were coming up to see you. May we come now?"

Ella pressed back a little sob. In doing so, she pressed upon a bunch of dried violets over the thumping little heart.

"Come—surely," she said, with a wistful smile.

REFUSED TO BE COMFORTED.

One Sabine, at Least, Felt He Had Real Cause for Grief.

"Sir Joseph Duveen, who died last month at Hyeres, on the Riviera, made his first success," said an art critic, "with his art galleries in New York. He was undoubtedly the greatest art dealer of his time.

"No one could gauge the popular taste as Duveen could. He made thousands by buying at a low price the work of unknown men who, later on, became, as he had calculated, great financial successes.

"Duveen once told me that he always got his porters to give him their opinion of new works. 'To get the public's view,' he would say, 'go direct to the public. Thus you learn surprising and valuable things. You find your hit-or-miss guesses all wrong.

"And to show that first-hand facts are better than the most ingenious guessing, Duveen used to point to an ancient Roman historian.

"This historian was studying the rape of the Sabine women. 'While the Sabine warriors were feasting with their wives, you know, the Romans stole and married those ladies.

"The historian wanted to study the grief of the Sabine men. He visited them, expecting to find them in sackcloth and ashes. But some were playing games, others sang and others again caroused.

"The historian, however, found one Sabine weeping on a rock. The man gnashed his teeth, and now he tore out handfuls of hair and beard, and anon he knelt and butted his head hard against his rocky seat.

"'Come, come!' said the historian, soothingly. 'Bear up, my man. All your friends have lost their wives no less than you, yet listen to their song and laughter. Bear up, like them.'

"'Ah,' groaned the Sabine, 'if you but understood. My wife was angry and refused to attend the feast, and I —I left her at home.'"

Work of Steam Shovels.

Steam shovel records on the Panama canal were recently broken by a 95-ton machine, which took out 55,119 cubic yards of soft rock at Gorgona in 25 working days. About the same time a 75-ton shovel took out 22,028 yards of earth and 20,333 yards of rock in 26 days, according to the Canal Record. The former shovel has a five-yard dipper and the latter a 2½-yard dipper. All shovels are kept under steam for eight hours a day, but are not actually worked during this period steadily owing to the necessity of moving them forward, blasting large stones and bringing up cars.

A Seasonable Explanation.

She—Not at all. A woman balks at marrying in leap year because she is afraid all her dear women friends will say she had to do the asking.—Baltimore American.

SCIENCE AND INVENTION

A SCIENTIFIC FAMILY.

Three Becquerels Achieve Distinction in Physical Science.

The recent death of Antoine Henri Becquerel, the French physicist, at the age of 56, recalls the interesting fact that he is the third of his name in direct succession to achieve eminence in physical science, and that he leaves a son who is also a physicist. Still more interesting is the fact that in certain lines each one of the family has continued and extended the work of those before him. Especially is this the case with the obscure subjects of phosphorescence and fluorescence, which Henri Becquerel cleared up so greatly by his discovery of the phenomena now generally classed together under the name of radioactivity, and which led directly to the sensational discovery of radium by Prof. and Mme. Curie. In La Nature (Paris) appears a sketch of this remarkable family, and especially of its latest member, by L. de Launay. Says this writer:

HENRI BECQUEREL.

The Third of a Brilliant Line of French Physicists, He Leaves a Son Who "Seems Ready to Continue This Fine Tradition."

"For three generations son has followed father as a member of the Institute (Antoine-Cesar, 1788-1878; Edmond, who died in 1891, and Henri), and a fourth seems ready to continue this fine tradition. . . . Long ago the first of the Becquerels, Antoine, to whom we owe the beginnings of electrochemisty, the electric thermometer, the electromagnetic balance, etc., hit incidentally upon one of those complicated subjects voluntarily neglected by the too methodical and precise investigators who wish to proceed surely and arrive on a fixed day—problems whose very obscurity promises, sooner or later, when their phenomena shall have reached maturity, sensational and suggestive discoveries. He attacked the question of phosphorescence, which he explained from the outset electrically. In this dynasty of scientists investigations have been handed down from father to son, who have used the same substances, preserved in the same laboratory. Later his son Edmond Becquerel, who, we may recall by the way, discovered the first method of color-photography, continued the study of the phosphorogenic rays, and thought that he had been able to show their identity with light-rays. At the same time with Niepce de St.-Victor, he . . . began the examination of the whole series of substances, such as the alkaline-earthy sulfates, the diamond, fluorin, and aragonite, that become luminous under the action of the solar rays; and studying fluorescence in the same connection he considered it as produced by the ultraviolet radiations. In 1883 Henri Becquerel took up this question of phosphorescence and studied the absorption of light by the components of uranium.

The work of Becquerel, Curie, etc., has made us acquainted with new forms of substance that transform part of the energy that they receive into chemical reactions. . . . We enter here into the vast field of the unknown, which is so attractive, and the name of Henri Becquerel will remain connected with one of the chief steps accomplished in the nineteenth century toward the acquisition of this domain.

Remains of a Mammoth.

The remains of a prehistoric elephant of mammoth proportions were unearthed recently in the bed of a small creek in Puddingstone canyon, half a mile north of San Dimas, by Prof. A. J. Cook, head of the department of biology, of Pomona college, Cal., and Edward P. Terry, a student. The bone frame, which is in a fair state of preservation, measures 26 feet in length, and 16 feet in height, and what remains of each of the enormous tusks is ten feet long. The parts of the huge skeleton that could be safely handled, were removed carefully to Claremont, and are to be placed in the museum of Pomona college. The discovery was accidental. The skeleton lay diagonally across the stream with only six inches of ground over it.

THE KANGAROO GIRL.

Her features are peachy, her eyes are bright,
Her lips are for kisses that clasp and woo,
Her neck is a curving of creamy white—
But
Why
Does
She Walk
Like
A
Kangaroo!

Her hair is a midnight of maddening joy,
Her form is a Psyche's and swains would sue
And Cupid would capture—the wise young boy!—
Except That She Walks
Like
A
Kangaroo!

Her mother, I think, doesn't know she's out,
For mothers are wise and discreet and true;
And if they but knew what their girls are about,
Not
One
Would Thus
Walk
A
Kangaroo!

THE CHINESE OLIGARCHY IN THIS COUNTRY

Growth of an Orginization That Is Unrelenting In its Feuds and a Menace to the Great Cities.

In the euchre party in which Ah Sin played it upon Bill Nye, Bret Harte discovered that for ways that are dark and tricks that are vain the heathen Chinese is peculiar. There is more truth than poetry, although the poetry is great in its line, in the conclusion. The opaqueness and duplicity of the character are not confined to cards or any other gambling devices of the race. When the heathen goes into murder he does it in a way that raises an inquiry as to whether there is any "punishment to fit the crime."

The average American shakes his head over conditions resulting from the murder of a white girl in New York city last June in the room of a Chinese who had been "converted" by the missionary efforts of the victim. The recent sentence in Boston of five Chinese to the electric chair next October for the murder of four of their slant eyed countrymen has brought out other facts that have added to the yellow menace in this country.

In every great city in the United States there are two rival organizations—warring factions—known as the On Leong tongs and the Hep Sing tongs. These are the offshoots of the Chinese Six Companies, the genesis of which is so remote, even in the empire of mystery, that it is known to but few of that land's scholars.

The relentless feuds between these two tong societies in the United States started a scare a few weeks ago that reached the state department in Washington and turned in an alarm to the capital of New York State, which was repeated to Mayor McClellan of New York city, who instructed the commissioner of police to invade the Chinese quarter of the metropolis with extra detatchments, uniformed members of the force and detectives in "plain clothes." For several days the usually stocial countenances of the almond eyed community were awry. The merchants of the quarter sent envoys to the national capital to acquaint the Chinese minister with the situation. In the absence of the minster the embassy hurried the next in authority to the state department.

The commotion in part was caused by an eruptive state in the Hep Sing society brought on over the sentence of the five Chinese in Boston, whose conviction the Hep Sing believed was the work of the On Leong tong. Tom Lee mayor of Chinatown and a leader of the On Leong tong, which is composed for the most part of merchants in the quarter, got out of the zone threatened with danger at the suggestion of the police. It was the opinion of the inspector who had the job in hand that Chinatown at the time was on the rim of an outbreak and that it was checked at psychological moment.

The situation was further agitated by the On Leong tongs of Boston, who held a meeting to avert what they thought was a plan of the Hep Sing tongs to openly avenge the approaching death of the five who had been sentenced to the chair. Conditions cleared, but so intense is the hatred of these societies, one toward the other, and so full of cunning is the race that the police of the cities named have been instructed to keep vigilant watch of the quarter where craft and opium go hand in hand.

It is believed that there has been less sleep recently from drug or otherwise in Chinese quarters generally than for many years. Whenever a policeman "pulls a box" in Chinatown an aggregation of Celestials lines up to watch for the arrest of a suspected highbinder.

The oligarchy of the cunning race in the United States is an alien government permeating the greatest democracy on earth. Their feuds seem to intensity with time. Assaults and murders by "agents" of the rival organizations have been increasing in numbers, and the stealthy manner of executing the crimes has quietly grown until the foreign excresence has become a serious menace to every large city.

According to the last census there were 119,000 Chinese in the United States, 70,000 being in Hawaii and 3,000 in Alaska. They are so bound and welded into societies and so absolutely cut off from all practical amenity to the laws of the land that they constitute a government within this government, totally distinct, totally independent and totally regardless of every principle of the civilization for which the American governstands.

From the Pacific slope to Chicago, from Boston to Baltimore, organizations and clans, fostered by the Six Companies, exact blackmail and hold hundreds or thousands in peonage, paying the wages they decide to dole out, taking back the wages by infallibly planned gambling devices from fantan to pigow, smuggling new helots across the Canadian border, drugging them with opium from their own country, killing them ruthlessly if they fall sick and do not die quickly enough to leave a satisfactory margin of profit, burying them and guaranteeing them celestial happiness hereafter, and finally digging up their very bones and boiling them white and shipping them back to China for permament interment.

Knowing that if he should be proved guiltless of any crime for which he is arrested he would be pursued by the rivals of his clan until he paid the penalty, a Chinese prisoner is apt to make confession of guilt when entirely innocent. It is this trait in the charactor which leads the New York police to believe that if the suspect in the Elsie Sigel case is kept in durance long enough he will admit that he did the murder.

In behalf of the Chinese it is asserted that, gamblers by nature, they have become restless and more sullen because the authorities have cut off their games and because of the treat to seperate those who are living with white women from the unnatural amalgamation.

HOMER RIVERS.

THE COMMON HOUSE FLY.

The change of the name of this most common of all household pests from "house fly" to "typhoid fly," as suggested by Dr. L. O. Howard in Bulletin 78 of the United States Department of Agriculture, is considered very appropriate and desirable, inasmuch as it is established by abundant evidence that this pest is now largely responsible for the spread of that dreaded disease "typhoid fever." It is well known that the germ of typhoid fever may be in the human system several weeks before it is detected and also for several weeks after all symptoms have disappeared and the patient apparently well. The excreta of such persons which may be in an open privy, or in many cases in country districts located anywhere around the outbuildings, is visited by the fly, whose feet and body are particularly adapted to carrying germs. This same fly after visiting such places may immediately return to the house of the sick or that of a neighbor and be seen crawling in the kitchen or dining-room over the food that is prepared to be eaten by unaffected persons.

Not only may the fly disseminate the disease to the healthy within the family of the sick or that of close-by neighbors, but there is every opportunity for the same infected fly to visit the village or city store where foods are exposed and thus spread the disease to those families who purchase them. The butcher wagon in the country or the trolley or express train carrying food such as sacked meats, etc., may easily become factors in the dissemination of this disease if such carriers are loaded at or visit points where conditions are favorable for visitation by infected flies. The house fly is connected with the dissemination of intestinal diseases other than typhoid fever.

Dr. Jackson, of New York, points out that the immunity from diarrhœa of breast-fed babies and the frequency of its occurrence among artificially fed babies indicates strongly the food as a medium of transmission, and further states that in his extended study of this problem along the water front of New York City during 1907 he found that the prevalence of these diseases among children and adults corresponded to the prevalence of flies. Further Dr. Felt in a recent paper states that "It is well known that flies feed upon sputum. Experiments by Lord recorded in the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal show that flies may inject tubercular sputum and excrete tubercular bacilli, the virulence of which may last for at least fifteen days. He considers the danger of human infection from this source to lie in the injection of fly specks on food, and suggests that during the fly season great attention should be paid to the screening of rooms and hospital wards containing patients with tuberculosis and laboratories where tubercular material is examined."

In Bulletin No. 78 of the Bureau of Entomology, United States Department of Agriculture, which should be read by every person in the State, Dr. Howard cites among other interesting data that Dr. G. Rober estimates that the decrease in the vital assets of the country through typhoid fever in a single year is more than $350,000,000. Dr. Howard says that the house fly as an important agent in the spread of this disease is responsible for a considerable portion of this decrease in the vital assets. As an agency in the spread of other intestinal diseases it must be charged with a great addition to this sum. Yet it is allowed to breed unrestricted all over the United States.

While the house fly cannot, of course, be charged exclusively with the dissemination of such intestinal diseases, the writer fully believes that no single factor aids in their spread during the fly season to a greater extent than this common pest of mankind.

Further than this the house fly is a vexatious nuisance in itself. Its presence in a house causes additional cleaning to paint work, walls, pictures, etc., as well as being a continual nuisance to the inhabitants whether asleep or awake in the day time. Dr. Howard estimates that "The house fly with mosquitoes necessitates an annual outlay for window and door screens in the United States of not less than ten millions of dollars." Even this amount is comparatively nothing to what should be spent for this purpose without there is and what we hope will be in the near future a united campaign conducted by the people in preventing the pest from reproducing.

On account of their omnicresence the task of getting rid of house flies would seem too great. Fortunately the matter is much simpler than we might expect. It simply means a proper care in the disposal of their preferred larval food, horse manure, and the maintenance of proper sanitary conditions around the house and vicinity. In cities, and especially in towns and villages where sewerage systems are absent and where adequate means of sewerage disposal are rarely present, such conditions should be governed through an ordinance by the Boards of Health or other designated officials.

Little will be accomplished by a few persons in a town or community in preventing them gaining access to their breeding places, if some neglect this duty, for a single pile of horse manure allowed to stand in the open will serve to furnish flies for a whole neighborhood. The greatest good therefore will result from the combined efforts of all persons keeping stables in a community in either having the manure removed from the stables and vicinity twice a week or keeping the manure in a screened portion of the stable, treating it after each addition with air-slaked lime.

Dr. Howard has shown how the presence of flies in a neighborhood of the city of Washington was materially reduced by such treatment of the manure from a horse stable nearby. The task of combating the pest in rural districts and around farm houses is largely an individual one and its presence in large numbers or to a limited extent will depend upon the sanitary conditions that are maintained around the house and barn. It is good farming practice to remove the fresh manure from the barns to the fields at least twice a week and if this is done and other sources of breeding material are protected, the pest will be largely mitigated around the home.

As indicated heretofore the question of protection of privies or open deposits of human excrement from access of flies either for breeding visitation, is of the utmost importance, for, as stated, it is by this means that the fly assembles the germs of disease and distributes them to any exposed food. It cannot be too strongly urged that all such places be constructed as sanitary as possible and free use of earth or lime be made for covering all deposits. The dropping of human excrement in the open in our towns and villages or around our farm homes should never be tolerated. It is not to be presumed that even under the best regulated conditions it will be possible to entirely eradicate this most common pest on account of the ever abundant field for its development. It therefore behooves every housekeeper to keep at least all eatables protected from flies. Too often it will be seen that the parlor is kept dark or screened from flies while they may be present in great numbers in the kitchen or dining room crawling over all food being prepared for consumption.

Therefore screens should be freely used to prevent the flies gaining access to the home; also strict sanitary measures employed in disposing of waste material.

The use of sticky fly papers or other patented means of catching flies that have accidentally entered the house is the easiest means of catching them. Fumigation with pyrethrum (Persian insect powder) is recommended when the flies are present in great numbers.

These measures should particularly be adopted by our merchants and those conducting eating houses, markets and dairies, etc., who serve the public with food that is likely to be contaminated by the dirty germ laden house fly. —Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station, Bulletin No. 134.

CHEERFUL OPTIMISM.

John W. Gates is the latest American financier to return from Europe to join the optimists' chorus. While his methods of expression are more picturesquely colloquial than those of J. P. Morgan and some other recently returned tourists, he is no more emphatic in predicting an era of unexampled good times for the United States. A trip abroad seems to exert such a cheering influence on our leading men of business that it is a pity the few remaining pessimists cannot be induced to take a run across the pond. The proper perspective for viewing our country seems to be best obtained in Europe. One fact which has especially impressed our financeirs who have been abroad this summer is the eagerness with which foreigners are seeking American stocks for investment purposes. French capitalists particularly are alive to the opportunities for placing their money advantageously in this country and they are keeping a close watch on American industrials. It is an encouraging sign that men renowned for their judgment in financial matters come back to America after studying the situation abroad "more bullish regarding this country than ever."

There is sound sense in Mr. Gates' remark concerning the economy practiced by the people generally during the business depression and its relation to the returning prosperity. As he puts it, Americans wore their old clothes and saved money, and the result is shown in the bank deposits, which are now available for industrial expansion. Millions of persons undoubtedly pared their living expenses to the lowest possible point and were surprised to to find on how little they could get along. When times improved many continued to exercise self-denial, and now they are in a position to increase their expenditures. Their money will now go into the channels of trade in steadily increasing volume and the beneficial effect will be felt in all lines of business.

THEORY OF A NEW RELIGION

Dr. Charles W. Eliot sees the passing of the old religion. In the signs of the times he reads the working of the great principle of evolution, applicable to the spiritual as well as the physicaldevelopment of man. With this in mind he told the theologians of Cambridge recently:

"The new religion will not be bound by dogma or creed. It will attack all forms of evil. There will be no deification of remarkable human beings. It will not teach that character can be changed quickly. It will not deal chiefly with sorrow and death, but with joy and life."

President Eliot proposes pure tolerance, since he predicts the disappearance of creed and dogma. His is a religion of love and happiness for it is the doctrine of joy and life. We want heaven here. We want joy, exuberance, vitality, love, fine consciousness of doing our work honestly, of growing into bigger and better men and women and we want these delights in this life. Given this condition it is presumable that the next life will quite naturaliy match the one on earth.

MR. WARFIELD A FACTOR

Ex-Governor's Re-Entry Into Politics Causes Stir.

The announcement by ex-Gov. Edwin Warfield that he was again in the political arena caused a great deal of interest in political circles Saturday.

Organization Democrats were inclined to think that Mr. Warfield should have made public his views before, so there would be more time to consider them. As it is, they say, his address will only have the effect of "mussing" up the situation when harmony is needed.

The Warfield men were elated over the prospect of having their former champion resume activities. They said that while Mr. Warfield's remarks were addressed only to Howard county, it means as much to the other people of the State.

An editorial in the Ellicott City Times, accompanying Mr. Warfield's notice, intimated that the former governor did not contemplate making any breach in the Democratic party in Howard county but the majority of the people in that county who have discussed the situation do not take such a view. They declare that not only is it impossible for Mr. Warfield to avoid creating an open break between State Senator Gorman and himself, but that Mr. Warfield has no desire to avoid the break and will use the first meeting as a wedge with which, as he hopes, to split the orginization in Howard county, of which Senator Gorman is the head.

People opposed to Mr. Warfield in his own party speculated as to what the object of his address might be, some of them declaring that he aspired to the United States Senate. In view of the fact that Senator Rayner's return to the Senate seems assured and this will mean a wait of at least six years before he could again run for the office, not much credence was placed in this theory, even by those most opposed to the ex-Governor's methods and utterances. That his continued political activity may make him one of those to reckoned with at the next nomination of a man for Governor on the Democratic ticket, is believed by some of those inclined to look "back of the announcement."

It is considered probable, however, that he will be elected as a delegate from the Fourth district of Howard county to the county convention, where he will be able to reiterate his views and may result also in his being sent to the State convention, where he would doubtless play as prominent a part as he did at the last one. That Mr. Warfield would take up the duties of a delegate to the State convention with earnestness is known.

The Republican politicians are glad that Mr. Warfield is getting back into the political game. One of them said a few days ago that he believed it would help the Republican ticket, because if Mr. Warfield intended showing that a Democratic administration could not keep down legislative expenses or pass proper laws, the Republican party could make political capital of it.

Had a Narrow Escape.

Mr. Bruce Moore, of near Terra Alta, employed as a driver by Mr. J. A. Kelly, of Oakland, met with a painful accident last Saturday, but miraculously escaped very serious injuries. He was engaged in hauling a load of stone from the Bishop farm north of town and was descending a steep hill when the brake beam of his wagon broke and he was precipitated beneath the rear wheel of the vehicle, which passed over both his ankles. The injuries resulting, while not fracturing the bones of either ankle were so painful that at the time it was feared both legs were broken. Mr. Moore was conveyed to the Home Sanatorium where he has been cared for since and will be sent to his home from there on Saturday of this week.

REPLY TO THE TRUE BLUE REPUBLICAN

You Have Given the Lie Direct. Dare You Stand Convinced and Proven a Falsifier Before the Public.

In last week's REPUBLICAN a gentleman (?) under the assumed name of True Blue Republican, and who signed his article Friendsville, Md., altho I suspect he does not reside at that town, undertook to answer and condemn the the open letter that I issued several weeks ago.

Now, Mr. True Blue, in your braying like a donkey you have demonstrated one of two things: You are either a thick headed ignoramus or if you intentionally made the charge that you made, then you are a straight-out liar!

In the first place you state that I am a Prohibitionist and not a Republican because of my stand on the liquor question. Here you at once show that you absolutely know nothing about the issue. The Prohibition party stands as it always has stood for immediate and absolute prohibition, the complete destruction of the liquor traffic. The Republican and Democratic parties have not made any declaration on this question. But men in either party have time and again stood for local option, and men in either party have legislated the saloon out of certain localities where public sentiment demanded it.

You charge the Anti-Saloon League of Baltimore City and some raw legislators, including myself, in exempting Oakland from the local option bill.

First, permit me to beg pardon of you poor misinformed whiskey soak (for I presume such you are or you would not be lamenting for this traffic) to inform you that no such organization exists as you have named. Please call it the Anti-Saloon League of Maryland after this. Now if you accuse me of being instrumental in exemption Oakland you lie; I can prove to you or any other man that I objected to all exemption when the bill was in the House

You say the saloon was legislated out of Accident and Mr. Miller at the distillery was given the right to sell liquor with out a vote. Do you know, or don't you want to know that the same one mile limit that closed the Accident saloon also closed the saloons at Bloomington and in No. 8, and I have still in my possession a petition signed by a majority of the voter in No. 4 appealing to the legislature to close the saloons in that district. The same appeal came from Accident and the most prominent men from No. 5 were demanding it. Why don't you condemn all these people and call them Prohibitionists? Why do you single out one man and vomit forth your rot? Why don't the people in No. 5 petition for a vote? They have the same privilege that Grantsville used.

Now he brays forth another gulf of froth. See here, Mr. No. Nothing, the Democratic party, being in the majority, prevented the passage of any seperate County Primary law. In Section 4, of the Primary law the following is found: "That any law or laws heretofore enacted affection the subject of primary election in any of the respective counties of the State be and the same are hereby repealed." You further state that I voted for the present law. That statement is a lie on its face. On page 1291 of the Journal is recorded the vote on the Corrupt Practice act and on page 1948 is the vote of the Primary election law and I am recorded in the negative.

You asked me to make a manly explanation of my vote. Now you make an explanation of this dastardly lie. Will you do it? I dare you to do it! Put the above in your pipe and smoke it, you narrow minded bigot!

You throw out the insinuation that I accepted the suggestion of the Journal and that that paper is my support, and I am being used by it. Another false statement, and as for the Journal supporting me, if it does I don't suppose that I should tell her to stand back. And now he rants and raves about the public printing. You have no logical argument to make against the proposition I favor, hence you resort to ridicule. Indeed I have gleaned but one thought that might be used with profit from your ravings here in opening your ignorant eyes. I suppose one might as well throw this article before swines. Some one has said there human hogs, but I never knew that they signed up T. B. R.

And now comes his masterstroke. I voted for an act to fix the qualifications of voters in municipals election in the city of Annapolis!

Turning to the House Journal I find that every Republican present in the House on that day voted for the bill, and according to this great judge of political action, aided the enemy of my party. How about the other Republican members of the House, including the floor leader, are they all traitors? What a shock! The rise of this little headed ignoramus to the high and exalted position of judge of legislatures! Isn't that a jar? An unknown oracle suddenly springs forth and pronounces sentence on an entire House of Delegates and all the members take a speedy exit in the direction of the political grave-yard.

Oh, thou great judge of men and issues! pray give us a little time and we will try to secure the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution abolishing the legislature and vesting the law making power in this mountain sage. Think of it, men, you have all been betrayed into the hands of the enemy, but here comes a liberator to lead you out of the wilderness. Hail! deliverer, hail!

You need no more information in regard to the Taft articles. A man of your wisdom and accurate knowledge knows all things, hence you certainly need no more information.

Continue at your pleasure to spew forth your denunciation and to spread your ignorance before the public demonstrating your fitness for a private cell at Sylvan Retreat, Cumberland, where you belong instead of in the Republican party. To you, my ignorant fellow citizen (which would be a better non-de-plume than T. B. R.), who I trust will some day see the light of intelligence and veracity, this is most

Respectfully dedicated,
L. F. GREEN.

COLLEGE ORATORICAL CONTEST

To Be Held at Mountain Lake Park, Monday, August 2, 1909.

The first College Oratorical Contest to be held at Mountain Lake Park, Md., promises to be a great success. Already six students have sent their themes and arranged to enter this contest. They are as follows: Mr. C. Edward Bender, Grantsville, Md., a student in Chicago University, has selected for his oration, "The Call of Humanity"; Mr. G. M. Steyer, Stoyer, Md., a student in the West Virginia Wesleyan College, has selected as the theme for his oration, "The Marriage Regulation Problem"; Mr. William L. Stedger, Moundsville, W. Va., a student in Allegheny College, Meadville, Pa., has selected as the theme for his oration, "Lincoln—A Life Tradegy"; Miss Minnie Jane Merrells, Tunnelton, W. Va., a student in the West Virginia Wesleyan College, has selected as the theme for her oration, "The Tragedy of Labor"; Mr. C. W. Wise, Amos, W. Va., a student in the West Virginia Weslevan College, has selected as the theme for his oration, "Crowns Trodden Under Foot"; Mr. Richard Aspinall, Buckhannon, W. Va., a student in the West Virginia Wesleyan College, has selected as the theme for his oration, "Oliver Cromwell as a Reformer."

A $25 gold medal has been given by Hon. James S. Lakin, President of the Board of Control of West Virginia, to be presented to the successful contestant. Hon. Thomas E. Hodges, formerly a member of the Faculty of the West Virginia University, and now treasurer of the Board of Control, will preside and present the medal. Hon. A. Hunter Boyd, Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals of Maryland, Hon. Thomas Ireland Elliott, member of the Supreme Bench of Baltimore, and Major J. M. Pangborn, assistant to the President of the B. & O., will serve as judges.

There will be no charge for admission to this oratorical contest, but a silver offering will be taken and after the necessary expenses, incidental to the preparation of this contest, have been met, the balance will be divided pro rata among the contestants to enable them to meet their necessary traveling expenses in taking part in the contest.

The Northern Natural Gas Company

OF MARYLAND

DESIRES To announce to the public that their gas lines are now complete to and in Oakland, and that on next Saturday evening, July thirty-first, at half past eight o'clock, they will give an exhibition of Gas illumination, in front of the old Court House at Oakland. All are cordially invited to see this display of nature's greatest light and fuel.

The Company further desires to state that on and after the above date they will be ready to make taps and supply the people of Oakland with Gas. All parties desiring to use Gas are invited to call at our office located on Second street, opposite the Garrett Memorial Church, where you will be cordially treated, and all information freely and gladly given.

For County Commissioner.

Mr. D. M. Dixon, of Oakland, District No. 7, announces his candidacy this morning for the nomination as County Commissioner. Mr. Dixon's executive ability and his keen foresight into business and commercial matters, his success as a merchant and his progressiveness in all that tends toward making Garrett county what it should be is his best recommendation and stands as a guarantee that should he be nominated and elected to the office to which he aspires he will render the county excellent service.

WANTED—A housekeeper for a family of three; a comfortable home for a good woman; references required; age between 30 and 50. Address box 324, Oakland, Md.

Mr. Charles G. Watson, of Frostburg, an avowed candidate for judicial honors in this circuit, was in Oakland Monday for an hour or two. Mr. Watson is making a quiet canvas among his political friends in Allegany and Garrett counties and is meeting with considerable encouragement. From Oakland he returned to his home at Frostburg Monday evening.

FOR SALE—Gasoline Engine in first class condition, 1½ H. P. sufficient to run cream separator, feed cutter, or pump; first cost $100. Will sell with batteries, water connection, cheap. Also one cast kitchen range in first class condition, six holes, water back and front, with connection to hot water tank and warming oven, cost $35. R. E. SLIGER.

Miss Elizabeth Leary, who was operated upon at the Home Sanatorium several weeks ago, was discharged from that institution last Saturday and is recuperating at her home on Water street. The operation performed upon Miss Leary was an extremely delicate one and her rapid recovery is due to a great extent to the excellent treatment she received while a patient in the sanatorium.

Next Thursday, August 5th, a lawn fete will be held at the residence of Mrs. Ellwood Offutt, near Oakland, by the ladies and for the benefit of the Presbyterian church. A special program for the entertainment of those who may be present, embracing some exceedingly novel features, has been arranged and will be carried out. Aside from this palatable refreshments will be on sale.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Rasche returned to their home in Oakland last Monday night from the honeymoon trip which included visits to Chicago, Niagara Falls, Portland, Maine, and other new England points. Mr. and Mrs. Rasche are at present stopping at the residence of Mr. James White, the bride's father. The couple will go to housekeeping shortly in the DeWitt residence on Second street.

A large congregation attended services in St. Paul's M. E. church in Oakland last Sunday morning when a former pastor of the church, Rev. George W. Kepler, preached a splendid sermon. While the discourse was more especially intended for mothers every one present left the church feeling that he or she had been materially benefitted by hearing the discourse. Elsewhere we print an excellent half tone of Rev. Kepler as he appears today.

Nearly a hundred members of the Young Men's Institute, a Catholic organization with principles similar to those obtaining in the Young Men's Christian Association of the Protestant churches, were here Sunday, Monday and Tuesday holding a convention, the object being to further the principles of the organization, exchange views how to accomplish the best results and elect delegates to the general convention to be held sometime during the fall of this year. The members of the convention arrived here on a special train Sunday morning and were accompanied to Oakland by more than four hundred friends and the Midland band, which organization gave a sacred concer on the street near the First National Bank building Sunday afternoon and evening. The excursion train bearing the party to Oakland departed in the evening at 7.30 o'clock.

NEGRO EMPLOYED ON ROAD WORK SHOT BY ITALIAN

Aim Was Good But Bullet Was Deflected By Victim's Ribs.

At the camp established by the road contractor who is engaged in building the state highway leading north from Oakland trouble broke out early in the week between the colored and Italian laborers, culminating on Sunday in the shooting of one of the negroes by one of the Italians, the bullet entering the colored man's left breast two inches above the nipple and coming in contact with the ribs it was deflected and passed around the man's body and was later probed for and removed from beneath his left shoulder blade by Dr. H. W. McComas to whose office the injured man was brought by some of his fellow-workmen. Later he was removed to the camp, where he is being cared for by others of the colored men.

The man who did the shooting disappeared almost immediately afterward, since which time no trace of him has been discovered.

Rev. George W. Kepler.

The above is a splendid likeness of the Rev. George W. Kepler as he appears today. As the minister of St. Paul's church in Oakland a number of years ago and as a resident of Garrett county before he entered the ministry, Mr. Kepler is well known and greatly beloved by many. His reappearance in the pulpit here last Sunday was a delightful surprise to many of his former parishioners.

Horses Frightened at Auto.

Monday evening a team belonging to John Blackburn, of near Schell, and driven by the owner, became frightened at a passing automobile at Mountain Lake Park and ran away, smashing the buggy to smithereens and injuring one of the horses pretty badly about the legs which were cut by the splintered pole of the vehicle. The man driving the auto so it is alleged, paid no attention to the frightened horses or the efforts of the drive, to control them but kept going at full speed. His identity was established later in the day as a guest at the Deer Park hotel where he was placed under arrest by Sheriff Brown and bonded for his appearance tomorrow morning before one of the local magistrates where he will answer the charge of exceeding the speed limit and operating his auto without a license.

No. 4.—Suburban home; ten acres of best land in country, highly improved with six room house, barns, orchards, etc. Worth $5,000 of any man's money. If taken immediately can be had for $3,700.

No. 5.—Excellent home in south suburbs of Oakland; 11 rooms, plenty of ground, excellent spring, fine view. Can be had at a bargain, $5,200.

No. 6.—Eight acres of excellent land and fourteen room house in north suburbs of Oakland. Most desirable place in city. Will sell for $9,000, or rent furnished for $45 per month.

No. 7.—Thirteen room house in Mt. Lake Park, two blocks from Auditorium, worth $4,000. If you want this beautiful home you can get it in the next thirty days for half that money.

No. 8.—100 acres at Deer Park, unimproved, but most excellent farming land; can be had for $1,200.

No. 9.—118 acres one-half mile from Deer Park; best soil in Garrett county; house, barn, 200 apple trees, 50 acres cleared. A bargain at $3,000.

No. 10.—33 acres, 3 miles west of Oakland; good farming or fruit land; buildings alone would cost $1,000; owner desires to go west and will sell quick for $1,250.

No. 11.—23 acres, improved; one mile from Oakland; ideal place for fruit or poultry farm. Would make an excellent place for a summer home.

No. 12.—65 acres one-half mile out of Oakland; best place on these mountains for a suburban home; a spring of pure water could be piped into the home. No buildings but most of the land is cleared. Will sell at $100 per acre

No. 13.—154 acres in North Glade; good improvements; excellent soil; 75 acres cleared and fenced; boiling spring of ice cold water at house. This is a new farm, 4½ miles from the railroad and if taken soon may be had for $2,500.

No. 14.—176 acres near Bittinger; best farm in that locality. The owner desires to leave state. Will sell for $4,000.

No. 15.—Fine home, eight room house and 19 acres of good land at Brookside, W. Va. Owner lives in the west and is anxious to sell for $1,300.

No. 16.—1700 acres in best farming locality of South Dakota. Two excellent sets of buildings; all modern conveniences; land in a high state of cultivation; owner has made nearly $100,000 on this place. I will sell this place for $35 per acre which is $10 less than land all around, and not so good, is selling for. Easy terms. Would be just the thing for two or three brothers or a man with a family of boys.

No. 17.—28 acres on Northwestern pike, nine miles south of Oakland; good house, barn and orchard. A good snap at $800. Owner has to sell.

No. 18.—255 acres adjoining No. 14, near Bittinger. Farm is almost level, free from stone, well watered; 70 acres cleared; $2,500 worth of saw timber; 700 sugar trees—just think of it. This farm must be sold quick and if you want a bargain you can get it for $3,500.

Am authorized to make a special price on Nos. 7 and 15. Must sell quick. Better thing it over and act before it is forever too late.

A number of desirable building lots in Oakland from $425 to $600. Buy these lots and lay a foundation for a fortune. These lots will double in value in a short time.

Mr. Dixon's executive ability and his keen foresight into business and commercial matters, his success as a merchant and his progressiveness in all that tends toward making Garrett county what it should be is his best recommendation and stands as a guarantee that should he be nominated and elected to the office to which he aspires he will render the county excellent service.

Mr. Charles G. Watson, of Frostburg, an avowed candidate for judicial honors in this circuit, was in Oakland Monday for an hour or two. Mr. Watson is making a quiet canvas among his political friends in Allegany and Garrett counties and is meeting with considerable encouragement. From Oakland he returned to his home at Frostburg Monday evening.

FOR SALE—Gasoline Engine in first class condition, 1½ H. P. sufficient to run cream separator, feed cutter, or pump; first cost $100. Will sell with batteries, water connection, cheap. Also one cast kitchen range in first class condition, six holes, water back and front, with connection to hot water tank and warming oven, cost $35. R. E. SLIGER.

Miss Elizabeth Leary, who was operated upon at the Home Sanatorium several weeks ago, was discharged from that institution last Saturday and is recuperating at her home on Water street. The operation performed upon Miss Leary was an extremely delicate one and her rapid recovery is due to a great extent to the excellent treatment she received while a patient in the sanatorium.

Next Thursday, August 5th, a lawn fete will be held at the residence of Mrs. Ellwood Offutt, near Oakland, by the ladies and for the benefit of the Presbyterian church. A special program for the entertainment of those who may be present, embracing some exceedingly novel features, has been arranged and will be carried out. Aside from this palatable refreshments will be on sale.

Mr. and Mrs. H. A. Rasche returned to their home in Oakland last Monday night from the honeymoon trip which included visits to Chicago, Niagara Falls, Portland, Maine, and other new England points. Mr. and Mrs. Rasche are at present stopping at the residence of Mr. James White, the bride's father. The couple will go to housekeeping shortly in the DeWitt residence on Second street.

A large congregation attended services in St. Paul's M. E. church in Oakland last Sunday morning when a former pastor of the church, Rev. George W. Kepler, preached a splendid sermon. While the discourse was more especially intended for mothers every one present left the church feeling that he or she had been materially benefitted by hearing the discourse. Elsewhere we print an excellent half tone of Rev. Kepler as he appears today.

Nearly a hundred members of the Young Men's Institute, a Catholic organization with principles similar to those obtaining in the Young Men's Christian Association of the Protestant churches, were here Sunday, Monday and Tuesday holding a convention, the object being to further the principles of the organization, exchange views how to accomplish the best results and elect delegates to the general convention to be held sometime during the fall of this year. The members of the convention arrived here on a special train Sunday morning and were accompanied to Oakland by more than four hundred friends and the Midland band, which organization gave a sacred concer on the street near the First National Bank building Sunday afternoon and evening. The excursion train bearing the party to Oakland departed in the evening at 7.30 o'clock.

NEGRO EMPLOYED ON ROAD WORK SHOT BY ITALIAN

Aim Was Good But Bullet Was Deflected By Victim's Ribs.

At the camp established by the road contractor who is engaged in building the state highway leading north from Oakland trouble broke out early in the week between the colored and Italian laborers, culminating on Sunday in the shooting of one of the negroes by one of the Italians, the bullet entering the colored man's left breast two inches above the nipple and coming in contact with the ribs it was deflected and passed around the man's body and was later probed for and removed from beneath his left shoulder blade by Dr. H. W. McComas to whose office the injured man was brought by some of his fellow-workmen. Later he was removed to the camp, where he is being cared for by others of the colored men.

The man who did the shooting disappeared almost immediately afterward, since which time no trace of him has been discovered.

Rev. George W. Kepler.

The above is a splendid likeness of the Rev. George W. Kepler as he appears today. As the minister of St. Paul's church in Oakland a number of years ago and as a resident of Garrett county before he entered the ministry, Mr. Kepler is well known and greatly beloved by many. His reappearance in the pulpit here last Sunday was a delightful surprise to many of his former parishioners.

Horses Frightened at Auto.

Monday evening a team belonging to John Blackburn, of near Sebell, and driven by the owner, became frightened at a passing automobile at Mountain Lake Park and ran away, smashing the buggy to smithereens and injuring one of the horses pretty badly about the legs which were cut by the splintered pole of the vehicle. The man driving the auto so it is alleged, paid no attention to the frightened horses or the efforts of the driver to control them but kept going at full speed. His identity was established later in the day as a guest at the Deer Park hotel where he was placed under arrest by Sheriff Brown and bonded for his appearance tomorrow morning before one of the local magistrates where he will answer the charge of exceeding the speed limit and operating his auto without a license.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man arrested by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda, through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.—He entered the cabin and discovered the English woman and her maid.

CHAPTER VIII.—Stephens quickly learned the wrong vessel had been captured, Lord Darlington's private yacht, the lord's wife and maid being aboard. He explained the situation to her ladyship.

CHAPTER IX.—Then First Mate Tuttle laid bare the plot, saying that the Sea Queen had been taken in order to go to the Antarctic circle.

CHAPTER X.—Tuttle explained that on a former voyage he had learned that the Donna Isabel was lost in 1752. He had found it frozen in a huge case of ice on an island and contained much gold.

CHAPTER XI.—Stephens, however, consented to be captain of the expedition. He told Lady Darlington. She was greatly alarmed, but expressed confidence in him.

CHAPTER XII.—The Sea Queen encountered a vessel in the fog. Stephens attempted to communicate, which caused a fierce struggle and he was overcome. Tuttle finally squaring the situation. Then the Sea Queen headed south again.

CHAPTER XIII.—Under Tuttle's guidance the vessel made progress toward its goal.

CHAPTER XIV.—De Nova, the mate, told Stephens that he believed Tuttle, now acting as skipper, insane because of his queer actions.

CHAPTER XV.—Stephens was awakened by crashing of glass. He saw Tuttle in the grip of a spasm of religious mania and overcame him. The sailor upon regaining his senses was [illegible].

CHAPTER XVI.—Tuttle committed suicide by shooting. Upon vote of the crew Stephens assumed the leadership and the men decided to continue the treasure hunt, the islands being supposed to be only 200 miles distant.

CHAPTER XVII.—Tuttle was buried in the sea, Lady Darlington pronouncing the service. Stephens awaking from sleep saw the ghost, supposed to have formed the basis for Tuttle's religious mania.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Upon advice of Lady Darlington, Stephens started to probe the ghost. He came upon Lieut. Sanchez, the drunken officer he had humbled in Chile. He found that at Sanchez' inspiration, Engineer McKnight played "ghost" to scare the men into giving up the quest.

CHAPTER XIX.—Stephens announced that the Sea Queen was at the spot where Tuttle's quest was supposed to be. The crew was anxious to go on in further search. De Nova and Stephens conquered them in a fist fight. Lady Darlington thanked him.

CHAPTER XX.—The Sea Queen started northward. She was wrecked in a fog. Stephens, De Nova, Lady Darlington and her maid being among those to set out in a life boat.

CHAPTER XXI.—Ten were rescued. Stephens saw only one chance in a thousand for life. Lady Darlington confessed her love to Stephens and he did likewise.

CHAPTER XXII.—Lady Darlington told her life story; how she had been bartered for a title, her yearning for absent love. She revealed herself as the school chum of Stephens' sister. She expressed a wish to die in the sea rather than face her former friends and go back to the old life. A ship was sighted.

CHAPTER XXIII.—The craft proved to be a derelict. They boarded her. She was frozen tight with hundreds of years of ice. Stephens found frozen bodies.

CHAPTER XXIV.—They accomplished the grewsome task of cleaning the cabin of the frozen bodies and rendering it fit for habitation. The vessel was the Donna Isabel, lost in 1753, 126 years previous.

CHAPTER XXV.

In Which We Learn the Story of the Donna Isabel.

The short Antarctic day left us little opportunity for the work on deck. However, I kept the men employed as long as possible, first setting them at hauling up the longboat and stowing it safely away under shelter, and then at untangling some of the raffle forward. They went at this last task rather unwillingly, for it was carried on in full view of that ice-casketed figure guarding the forecastle, yet they got out two fairly serviceable spars and a considerable amount of cordage so protected by the ice coating as to be still of value. When we finally knocked off and started aft in a body, a dark, cloudy night was about us, the snow falling so thickly as to make it impossible to see across the deck. Dade was busily preparing supper in the wrecked galley, the red glare of his fire shining forth through the drifting flakes, while glimpses of light stole out in welcome from the forward cabin windows.

The latter appeared shipshape and cheerful enough as we slid back the door and stepped within. Scarcely a reminder was left of that horrible interior dominated by death which had been revealed to me a few hours before by the smoky glare of the torch. While we were laboring forward to clear the deck, Doris and Celeste evidently had also been diligently employed, and with womanly intuition had given to the desolate interior a home-like touch which was irresistible. I could only come to a pause—gazing about and wondering if we could really be afloat upon a century-old wreck, tossed helplessly on the waters of the Polar sea. The odd, old-fashioned swinging lantern threw violet-hued rays over the snug scene, while in the center the table, covered by a spotless cloth, was fairly glistening in a brilliant display of ancient silver, newly polished, and of decorated glass. Doris, who had been engaged in giving the arrangement some final deft touches, turned instantly at the sound of our entrance, her sweet face brightening with interest as she read the amazement pictured in my eyes.

"You have actually worked a marvel!" I exclaimed, admiringly. "Where in the world did you unearth such a display?"

"From a locker behind the steward's pantry," she replied, smilingly. "But, oh," with a shiver, "it was most bitterly cold in there when we first opened the door. I actually had to wait half an hour before venturing in. Yet you should have seen what we found; this is not half—the silver service was simply magnificent; and see—every piece is beautifully engraven with a fac-simile of the ship, and a masterpiece of art."

I gazed at the bit of plate handed me, weighing it in my hand, and studying the decidedly elaborate scroll.

"I have read that these old galleons were often furnished regardless of expense," I said, "and the Dons were high livers. Did you make any other discoveries?"

"Only several cases of liquor, but all were frozen solid. The lazarette opens from the pantry, and we succeeded in lifting the trap-door, but the cold of the air which came up was so intense that we were compelled to drop it again immediately. I never imagined such an atmosphere possible."

"It is the breath of 126 years of polar winter," I explained. "This very cabin was of that same temperature when we first broke through its ice covering."

She pressed her palms to her temples, staring about her at the gray, gold-decorated interior.

"Do you actually mean to tell me that—that this wreck has been drifting and tossing about all that time?" she questioned unbelievingly.

"No, not drifting and tossing about, but solidly imbedded within the ice far south of this. This vessel is the Donna Isabel—the same one Tuttle saw—and her log-book lies in that farthest state-room yonder. Its last entry was made in September, 1753."

She sank down upon the bench, her eyes upon my face, and I heard her lips repeating softly: "September, 1753, September, 1753," as though the conception could hardly find acceptance in her mind. The men were grouped close beside the entrance, while De Nova and Celeste had gone forward to assist Dade in bringing his supper from the galley, so that for the moment we were comparatively alone. As I bent over, wondering what I had best say, she questioned quickly, with a little sharp indrawing of the breath:

"And—and the people, Jack,—the—crew? What became of them?"

"Dead more than a century ago," I answered solemnly. "I did not stop this morning to read the log, and so I know little of their story. But the vessel itself tells of storm and of long struggle in the ice; probably most of those on board perished from exposure and cold."

Her hands clasped mine, her cheeks white from apprehension.

"Were—were there any—any bodies—here?"

"Yes," I replied reluctantly, not daring to say otherwise.

"How—how many?"

"Four men, a woman, and a child."

An instant she stared into my face; then swept her eyes about the lighted cabin, only to bury them within her hands, her whole body trembling.

"A—a woman and child! Here! here! for 126 years! Oh, merciful God!" she lifted her eyes again, filled with horror, her hands clenched. "They—they were actually here, appearing natural? looking as they did in life?"

"Yes; they seemed to be sleeping, for they had been solidly frozen in the very attitudes in which they died. The woman rested on the couch yonder. She had beautiful dark hair and eyes, and must have been about 30 years of age. The child was in a bunk, a little flaxen-haired girl of three or four."

"And—and you buried them?"

"As best we could. We wrapped them in blankets, and consigned them to the deep, with a prayer for their souls." I bent closer. "Doris, dear, don't let this rest so heavily upon you. I wish I might have kept it all hidden. It was only the end of one of the innumerable tragedies of the sea. We must face our own needs now, and that task will require all our courage."

I thought she did not hear me, the tears continuing to fall between her fingers, half suppressed sobs shaking her form. Yet as I rested my hand upon her shoulder, she looked up at me out of moistened eyes, her lips firmly set.

"Yes—yes; I know, Jack, but—but it is all so terrible, and—and has come to me with such a shock. I can not comprehend it—that they should have actually been here—here, all those years—waiting! But I will not think of it any longer; I—I will do something to make me forget."

We all messed together, sitting upon the long benches drawn up about the table, Dade waiting upon us, with Doris and Celeste occupying places between De Nova and myself. At the beginning we spoke little, the strangeness of our surroundings holding us silent, but the minds of all being busy with the same thought, we insensibly drifted into conversation regarding our chances of rescue, and the history of the old vessel in whose cabin we floated. Once De Nova introduced the subject of the treasure which might be stored away below deck, and the men exhibited their interest by numerous question; but I gave them little encouragement along this line, realizing that for the present our earliest effort should be to transform the wreck into some degree of safety—a sail first, and a clean rudder; these attained, the search for treasure might begin.

What a scene and group that was!—the wintry night without, the drifting fog of snow, the helpless hulk rising and falling upon the treacherous heave of the sea, that odd, violet colored light gleaming over us. The faces are even before me—the girlish looking Celeste, with her dark curls and white teeth; Lady Darlington, her gray eyes still moist as she glanced about the interior, unforgetful of its memories; De Nova, jaunty as ever, with no thought beyond the present, recalling to my mind with every movement the face of that dead Spaniard who for more than a century had sat where he was sitting; Sanchez, pale and with that hunted look, a counterpart no doubt of some seaman this ship had known in other days; McKnight, burly and red-necked; Kelly, his blue eyes filled with the merriment of old Ireland; Johnson, broad-shouldered, and sober-faced, eating steadily, with never a lift of his shaggy brows; and Dade, fluttering about like a waiter ashore, with his eternal smirking and suggestion of a tip.

When the dishes had finally been removed I gave the men permission to smoke, went back to the after state-room, and brought forth the log-book, which we made an effort to decipher. It was roughly written and by a number of different hands, and between us our knowledge of early Spanish script was barely sufficient to enable us to read a portion of it. The earlier entries made by the captain, although badly faded, were legible enough, bringing the story of the voyage down to the latter part of July, and recounting a series of severe gales, involving the loss of several members of the crew. Then a new hand took up the pen, "Balaza, first officer," the captain having been killed by a falling spar; for a week or ten days the tale was of fierce struggles in the ice-pack, and a steady drift to the southward. Others followed—"Alcassar, second officer," "Salvatore, government agent," every line the record of new disaster, gales, wrecked rigging and death. They were locked in beyond all hope early in August, vast hummocks overhanging the deck, the forecastle sealed by ice, the cold so deadly the red-hot stove scarcely kept the numbing chill from the cabin, the doors and windows of which they had covered with blankets. Not a day passed but that they carried out their dead upon the ice, leaving them beyond sight of the deck. The names were all written down. There came a time when the survivors were too few and weak even for that service; when they could do nothing but cower within the cabin and cast dice to settle on who should go down into the icy hold and bring up the fuel which alone kept life in them. They drank and played cards; they quarreled, forgetting everything human and reverting to brutes. The child of Senora Alcatras died; the next day the mother went quietly to sleep, never to wake again. They did not even know when her final breath came. She was the last of the women. The boatswain, Pedro Reo, passed away that same night, sitting on the deck; and there was left only Salvatore, who had gone mad, a seaman named Juan Ruiz, and a passenger, Antonio Saltere. It was the latter who wrote the final entry, September 11, 1753: "I touched Ruiz just now, he was stone cold; there is only Salvatore left, grinning at me across the table; the last candle is going out, too, and I haven't strength to go after more. Jesu, mercy." It ended in the blank page.

I straightened up, unable to articulate, scarcely able to see. Celeste clung convulsively to De Nova's sleeve, her eyes staring at me, her lips parted as if for a scream; Doris had bowed her face upon the table; the men sat horrified, breathing heavily. So intense was the silence that I could hear the crackling of the coal, the sharp swish of snow against the window. And that, awful thing had actually happened here, here where we were sitting! Here in the pitiless darkness, those last two lives had gone out to meet their God—despairing, hopeless; Scarcely realizing what I did, I bent low over Lady Darlington.

"Doris, sweetheart," I whispered, my words barely audible to her alone, "this will drive us all mad unless we can do something to bring back faith and hope. I beg of you to sing to us, sing to us here."

She looked up, white-faced, wet-eyed, her hands trembling violently as they touched mine.

"Oh, I could not, I could not; the words would choke me."

She arose unsteadily to her feet, gripping the table, then the back of the bench, and thus helped, staggered rather than walked forward. A long, breathless moment she stood, grasping the window-casing, staring blindly out into the dark, the snow flecking the glass, her shoulders bent and trembling. She turned slowly, ashen-lipped, one hand shadowing her eyes. Twice she endeavored vainly to find voice; then, clear, yet with the glistening of tears clinging to each word, she sang:

Jesus, Saviour, pilot me
Over life's tempestuous sea;
Unknown waves before me roll,
Hiding rock, and treacherous shoal,
Chart and compass come from Thee;
Jesus, Saviour, pilot me.

While I live I remember the wondrous change in her face as she sang—the effect pictured in those faces watching her.

As a mother stills her child,
Thou canst hush the ocean wild;
Boisterous waves obey Thy will,
When Thou sayest to them: "Be still."
Wondrous Sovereign of the Sea,
Jesus, Saviour, pilot me.

She straightened, her fine eyes darkening, and I noticed Johnson leaning forward, clenching the table with his hard hands.

When at last I near the shore,
And the fearful breakers roar
'Twixt me and the peaceful rest,
Then, while leaning on Thy breast,
May I hear Thee say to me,
"Fear not, I will pilot thee."

In the intense silence that followed she crossed to where I sat, placed one hand upon my shoulder, and bent down until her cheek pressed my sleeve. One by one the men filed gravely out into the darkness of the deck, leaving us there alone.

CHAPTER XXVI.

In Which We Find Treasure.

We began to dream of treasure as soon as the fierce winds ceased and the waves fell. The lust for wealth, partially blunted by the requirements of hardship and peril, revived within us the instant nature granted a temporary respite. The memory of the three million pesos that might be stowed away below began to haunt our imaginations, and the story of it found utterance on our lips. The negro blurted it forth, his eyes rolling, and De Nova came direct to me, asking, in behalf of the men, the privilege of making search. There was no excuse for refusal, even had I desired to find one, as the decks were cleared of the debris left by the storm, and the Donna Isabel rode her course easily to a lashed helm. Leaving Dade above to keep a watchful eye on the weather, I willingly led the others into the steward's pantry, where we pried open the door leading down into the lazarette.

That same intense cold of the Antarctic smote us the moment the creaking hinges yielded, and we stood peering down through the aperture. We waited impatiently for the first frigid breath to escape, huddled about the stove in the cabin, and recalling various sea tales of treasure seeking, which only served to whet our appetite for the coming adventure. Now and then I lifted my eyes, meeting Doris' questioning glance, and assured that I understood her mood.

At last, but well wrapped in our mufflers and bearing a candle aloft to cast its flickering yellow light through the pitchy darkness, we ventured below, scrambling down the short ladder. Cole held the glim, his black face shining, the whites of his eyes conspicuous as he stared eagerly about. We found innumerable boxes and barrels, crates, bottles and wicker flasks, some open, the packing straw strewn about, others tightly nailed, piled everywhere, evidence that the galleon had been amply provisioned for a long voyage, and that her crew had never perished of starvation. It had been the cold, the loneliness, the awful agony of their hopeless condition that had left the Donna Isabel a charnel ship. We handled this collection rapidly, contenting ourselves with merely testing the weight of each package, quickly convinced that none was heavy enough to conceal precious metal. This job must have occupied more than an hour, handicapped as we were by the poor light, and several times I glanced through the open trap overhead to observe the faces of the women framed there as they watched us silently. Once Dade stared down, bringing word the sky was thickening in the west, and lingering to observe our operations until I had to order him back upon deck.

They Came Howling About Me Like So Many Wolves, Eager to See.

A solid, nail-studded, oaken door appeared in the forward bulkhead, and so soon as we had succeeded in handling every article stored within the lazarette, I had a passage cleared to it, the men working with feverish impatience. When finally reached, the door was locked and seemingly as solid as the bulkhead itself, nor did a search of the after state-rooms reveal any keys. No doubt they were in Salvatore's pocket, many a league astern. But Kelly and McKnight brought down the cleaver and an iron bar, and proceeded to burst it open, the rest of us crowding about, too cold and excited to keep still, but very confident the treasure awaited us within. My own heart beat fiercely with anticipation, and I heard De Nova swearing in French, quite unable to control himself. It seemed to me that door would never yield; but at last Johnson managed to get a purchase low down, and with Cole heaving at his side, they fairly tore the wood asunder. Through the considerable opening thus made there burst a torrent of icy water into our very faces, extinguishing the light, and sending us stumbling backward to the ladder, up which we swarmed almost in panic. Anything unexpected in that ghost-ship made cowards of us all, and we fought our way forth into the daylight in a suddenness of terror almost ludicrous, swearing and clawing at each other like madmen.

It required another hour for the deluge of water to drain away through the deck, after which we ventured below again, the relighted candle revealing slush-ice everywhere, with a considerable trickle still gurgling through the hole in the door. However, we had an opening to work at, and soon succeeded in tearing most of the obstruction away piecemeal, only to be confronted by a solid barrier of glittering ice fully five feet thick, leaving a space at the top of the door barely sufficient for a man's body to pass through. De Nova, cursing as if he had gone crazy, hoisted me to the top of it, where I clung precariously, holding the sputtering candle aloft, and peering about over the gleaming surface and through into the black shadows. Good Lord, but it was cold, repellent, frightful! The beams supporting the deck, huge, black timbers, were within easy reach of my hand, and forward the spectral glow of daylight streamed in through the rift in the deck-planks above. But from one bulging side to the other extended this solid mass of ice, the congealed draining of a century of waves that had dashed their salt spray down the opening ripped by the wrecked mainmast. No wonder the old hulk hung sodden with all that lead below!

I crawled forward as far as the silvery butt of the mainmast whence I could look up through the splintered deck to the narrow strip of sky overhead. There was a bulkhead forward, but the ice extended solidly to the wood. I could hear the ceaseless swell of the sea pounding against the sides, the groaning of timbers, the flapping of the jib's canvas, and realized more than ever before the sickening, sodden roll of the laden hull. The level surface of the ice told plainly enough its story of formation; when all that water came through, the vessel had been upon an even keel, imbedded firmly, no doubt, in the ice-pack. I crept back as cautiously as I had advanced, the rolling of the wreck rendering the slippery surface dangerous to travel over. The men watched me anxiously as I slid down into the lazarette.

"What did you find, sir?"

"Nothing except ice, solid ice clear to the forward bulkhead. It looks as though we had reached the end of our treasure-hunt, my lads."

There was a sullen growl of profanity, McKnight viciously slashing at the ice-front with his cleaver. Twice he struck, with no other object except the venting of his ungovernable anger, his forehead beaded, the great muscles of his arms standing out like whip-cords. A considerable chunk scaled off, falling thumping to the deck, and causing him to spring backward to escape injury. As if maddened by this, he drove in the blade of the ax again—it clanged against metal! We all heard it; we all witnessed the rebound.

"By God, mates, there's one of 'em, anyhow!" roared a voice, hoarse from exploding excitement. But I was already upon my knees, feeling blindly into the ice cavity.

They came howling about me like so many wolves, eager to see with their own eyes, but I crowded them back, snatching the candle from De Nova's fingers and throwing the flickering light down level with the deck.

"It's a brass-bound chest, men," I cried, straightening up and facing them. "But it is going to require some hard digging to get it out. About all I can see is the handle of it."

I never comprehended before how the passion and lust for gold can express itself upon men's faces. Tense, motionless, breathing heavily, their features drawn, their eyes gleaming feverishly in the yellow flame, they stared at me and then at that ice-front, demented and speechless. No one thought of where we were—castaways, our lives the sport of winds and waves, a sodden wreck under us, our nearest port a thousand miles away across a stormy sea; all we realized at that moment was that there, just before us, under that mantle of ice, lay buried three million pesos. God! the collar of my jacket seemed choking me; I breathed as if a man's fingers clutched my throat, and I saw McKnight's burly form shaking as if he had an ague fit. Three million pesos! The hot blood rushed to my head, a lava stream, and De Nova's face, white as chalk behind his little black mustaches, seemed dancing before me ghostlike. Damn him! the fellow made me think of Salvatore, the man who, just above, frozen and dead, had guarded this treasure for 126 years. I cast the suggestion aside with a curse and a laugh, grasping Kelly by the shoulder to steady myself—to realize these were real men, this task before us real work. It was like com-

Close of Paul's Second Journey

Sunday School Lesson for August 1, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 18:1-22. Memory verses 9, 10.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"In the world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."—John 16:33.

TIME.—From late A. D. 51 to early 53. Paul was at Corinth a year and six months.

PLACE.—Corinth, the political capital of Greece, the metropolis of commerce.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

1. Corinth, the Vanity Fair of the Roman empire. Corinth, the center of government, commerce and business, as Athens was of learning, literature and art, was situated on the isthmus which joins the great divisions of Greece. It attracted people from all over the world on account of its delightful climate. It contained a population of 400,000, of the most heterogeneous nature possible; a population of Greek adventurers and Roman bourgeois, with a tainting of Phoenicians—a mass of Jews, ex-soldiers, philosophers, merchants, sailors, freedmen, slaves, tradespeople, hucksters, and agents of every form of vice—a colony without aristocracy, without tradition, without well-established citizens. Hence it suffered from democratic license and turbulence.

2. Paul's Labors Among the Corinthian Jews.—Vs. 2-6. 1. His Opportunity. This great city with its worldliness, and absorption in pleasure, its vigorous and varied life, its infinite needs, gave Paul a great opportunity. And yet the difficulties were so immense, the obstacles so insurmountable that it is no wonder that Paul came to them feeling his weakness, and in fear and trembling (1 Co. 2:3) and needed the vision of cheer (v. 9).

2. His Four Friends.—Paul had a strong, social nature and felt the value of friends. He "found a certain Jew." Paul always began with the Jews, as the best possible opening for his work. He was a tentmaker named Aquila, a man of some wealth, "born in Pontus" but doing business in Rome. His wife was named Priscilla, and is supposed to have been a Gentile.

3. In addition to these friends, Silas and Timotheus came from Macedonia. They had been left at Berea, when Paul was compelled to leave (Acts 17: 13-15). Timothy had been sent to Thessalonica (1 Thes. 3: 6), and from Philippians 4:15 we judge that he had visited Philippi also. Paul's friendly heart was cheered by their presence.

The Circumstance in Which Paul Worked.—1. He earned his own living by working at his trade. He was thus a living sermon, as it was Jewish law that every boy be taught a trade some kind for his support.

2. He attended (v. 4) "the synagogue every Sabbath and reasoned with the Jews" and Greek proselytes, determined to know nothing among them save Jesus Christ and him crucified (1 Cor. 2:2).

4. He met bitter opposition from his countrymen. (v. 6) "They opposed themselves." The intensity and success of Paul's labors kindled an intensity of opposition. The result was that the Jews (v. 6b) "opposed themselves, and blasphemed." That was a sign that the Gospel was becoming a power in the community.

III. Paul's Work Among the Corinthian Gentiles.—Vs. 7-22. Paul's Preaching Place was in the house of a man named (v. 7) "Justus, one that worshiped God," a Gentile believer in the one true God, but not a Jew, "whose house joined hard to the synagogue." Here would be a perpetual invitation to the Jews, while at the same time the Gentiles would feel welcome to go there.

During this period Paul wrote his two letters to the Thessalonians.

Renewed Opposition. This was both natural and providential. It was time for Paul to go on with his wider mission which no one could carry on as well as he. But his work seemed so necessary where he was, and his vision had bidden him to stay, how long he did not know, that it was necessary that some unmistakable guidance should make his duty clear and plain.

18. After continuing for some time longer at his work, Paul went to Cenchrea, the port of Corinth, where he made a vow and then sailed for Cesarea, stopping at Ephesus on his way. Thence he went up to Jerusalem where only the vow could be consummated. Moreover he wished to be at the great feast of the Jews, probably the Passover. (v. 21.)

The Vow. The shaving of the head indicates a vow of separation like that of the Nazirite prescribed in Numbers 6, in a later modified form. The man under the Nazirite vow was to drink no wine or strong drink, and to let no razor pass over his head or face. The hair was shorn at the beginning and end of the period, so as to present that grown in the interval. At the end of the time during which the vow lasted, his hair was shaven.

As Rendall suggests, Paul may have wished to show that although he had broken with the synagogue at Corinth, yet he was a true Jew and a faithful disciple of Moses, by paying homage to the law and submitting to its rules. This would also be shown by his attendance at the Passover.

Thus closes the second missionary journey.

Make a brief review of these years: 1. By the map, tracing out the course of Paul's travels. 2. By cities and countries. 3. By person. 4. By events. 5. By a summary of the results in the progress of Christianity.

The Fence And After

By Barry Preston.

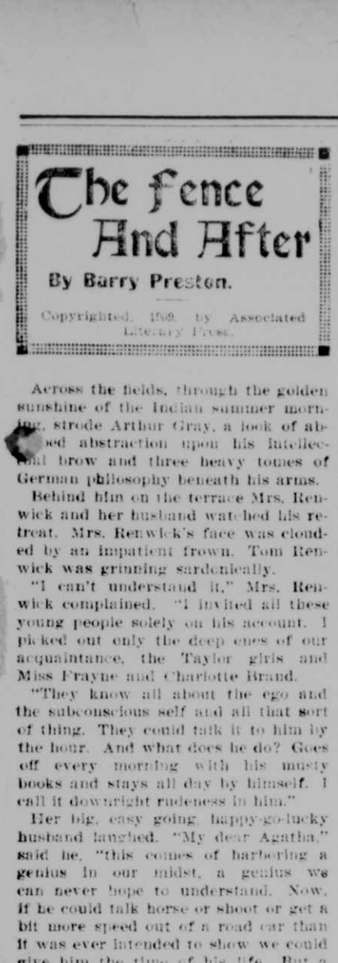
Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

Across the fields, through the golden sunshine of the Indian summer morning, strode Arthur Gray, a look of abstracted abstraction upon his intellectual brow and three heavy tomes of German philosophy beneath his arms.

Behind him on the terrace Mrs. Renwick and her husband watched his retreat. Mrs. Renwick's face was clouded by an impatient frown. Tom Renwick was grinning sardonically.

"I can't understand it," Mrs. Renwick complained. "I invited all these young people solely on his account. I picked out only the deep ones of our acquaintance, the Taylor girls and Miss Frayne and Charlotte Brand.

"They know all about the ego and the subconscious self and all that sort of thing. They could talk it to him by the hour. And what does he do? Goes off every morning with his musty books and stays all day by himself. I call it downright rudeness in him."



Her big, easy going, happy-go-lucky husband laughed. "My dear Agatha," said he, "this comes of harboring a genius in our midst, a genius we can never hope to understand. Now, if he could talk horse or shoot or get a bit more speed out of a road car than it was ever intended to show we could give him the time of his life. But a philosopher, dropped here among our unintellectual selves—dear heavens!"

He threw out his hands in a gesture of deprecation and made a wry face.

"But he is a coming man," Mrs. Renwick began.

Tom Renwick's grin broadened.

"He seems to be a going man just at present," he remarked, with a bob of his head in the direction of the stoop shouldered figure trudging across the fields. "It's desertion, pure and simple. Your intellectual maidens corralled here must evidently philosophize without your lion to inspire them.

"Come on! Let's round 'em up and give 'em a whirl in the road cars up to the top of Bald hill and back. That will take their minds up for the time being at least."

"It's the last time I'll ever try to entertain a genius," Mrs. Renwick declared flatly, "even if the said genius is my cousin and has done the family proud."

"Amen! I'm with you there," said Tom heartily as he turned from the terrace and strode off toward the garage.

In the meantime Arthur Gray, quite oblivious to this criticism of his actions, tramped down the field, climbed a stone wall into an orchard, where the trees were deep laden with their wealth of fruit, and, selecting a corner where the mottled shadows were most inviting, settled himself comfortably on the ground, opened one of the ponderous volumes and was soon lost in the abstruse speculations of its author.

He read on in absorbed fashion, now pausing to thoroughly digest some choice morsel, now frowningly noting upon the margin his own opinion of the text at that point. It was an ideally quiet place in which to pursue his research.

But suddenly the quiet was rudely shattered. Just beyond the orchard came the pounding of rapid hoof beats. A girl's voice urging forward her mount rang through the still air. There was the swish of a hunting crop, a loud command, "Up, Rajah!" Then the sound of hoofs suddenly ceased.

A masculine voice said, "He'll never do it, ma'am!" And the girl's voice replied, with a note of obstinacy in it, "He'll stay here until he does."

Gray arose. He walked to the edge of the orchard and looked afield. On the smooth turf of the adjoining field a girl—a wonderfully pretty girl—sat on a horse, which she had evidently fence just before her.

A little distance to the rear a trim, silent groom upon another horse impassively watched the proceedings.

Even as Gray watched them the girl wheeled her horse and galloped away from the fence. Then she turned him touching him lightly with the crop and rode full tilt for the fence again.

But, arrived at the fence, the horse refused to jump. The girl gave a little cry of annoyance.

"Silly Rajah!" she said. "You should be ashamed of yourself. You could take it easily. I know you could. Now, then, once more!"

Again she wheeled the horse and cantered away, only to turn him and ride for the fence once more.

Gray in his interest quite forgot himself. He vaulted the low wall that separated the orchard from the field and ran forward.

"Don't try it!" he cried warningly. "It's too high! He'll never do it in the world!"

The girl turned to look at him coldly. Then she smiled.

"Oh, yes he will!" said she. "All he needs is a little confidence."

"Don't try again," said he.

She raised her eyebrows. "I can't stop now," said she. "He must go over that fence now that he knows it is what I expect of him."

"Then let me put him to it," said he.

The girl looked surprised. "Aren't you the philosopher friend of the Renwicks?" she asked.

"I am," he confessed. Involuntarily he straightened his stooping shoulders. "But even philosophers sometimes ride," said he. "I'd like to put him to the fence if you don't mind."

Instantly the girl slid from the saddle. "Do so by all means," she suggested. "I've been trying it all the morning, and I confess I'm beginning to doubt my ultimate success with him."

Gray looked at her pretty flushed face and her sparkling eyes.

"And if I succeed what reward do I get?" he inquired boldly.

The girl laughed. "You may have a canter with me up to Bald hill and back," said she.

Gray sprang into the saddle. A man in a sidesaddle is not a particularly graceful figure. But there was a light in his eyes and a general determination in his whole bearing that went far toward making up for his lack of grace.

Three times he put the horse to the fence, each time with no success. The fourth time he plied the crop freely.

They reached the fence, and the big horse rose lightly, cleared the top bar by a good two feet and landed easily on the other side.

"Bravo!" cried the girl. "Splendid! Splendid! Splendid!" And even the groom ventured an involuntary "Well done, sir!"

"And now," said Gray, his eyes glowing with eager light, "I shall claim that canter with you. Shall we go now?"

He slipped from the saddle and helped her to mount.

"You will take Peter's horse," she said, turning to the groom. "Come on!"

Up the field they galloped gayly together, swung into the road and headed for Bald hill. Back in the orchard a woodpecker chased a nimble grasshopper over the pages of a work of German philosophy.

Just as they reached the bend near the summit of the hill they encountered Renwick and his party in the two road cars coming down the road.

Mrs. Renwick stared in wonder. Her husband chuckled openly. Gray lifted his hat, utterly without embarrassment, and, with the girl at his side, went on up the hill.

* * * * * * *

"To think of it!" exclaimed Mrs. Renwick some two weeks later. "Arthur engaged to that Carlton girl! Why, she can't draw a breath without talking horse, and that's all she can talk!"

Renwick looked out the French window to the drive beyond, where Gray was helping a decidedly pretty young woman to her horse.

"For my part, Agatha," said he, with deep conviction, "I am mightily rejoiced. It shows that for all his intellect he has a decidedly human streak in him."

A Washington Anecdote.

Rev. Mason L. Weems, who first published and is believed by many persons to have invented the story of George Washington and the cherry tree, used many anecdotes in his life of Washington to illustrate his exalted view of the liberator's character. One of these shows Washington as a talker of politics. At the age of twenty-two he was colonel of the Virginia military organization stationed at Alexandria. A local political campaign was on. Washington was a great friend of one of the candidates. A Mr. Payn was strongly in favor of the other man. Argument waxed warm. Young Washington made a heated remark, to which Mr. Payn took offense. Mr. Payn carried a cane—one of those heavy sticks so popular in colonial days. He raised his cane, brought it down upon the head of the future Father of His Country and laid the young colonel along the floor.

Some of Washington's soldiers wanted to fight, but he restrained them. He went to his room, pondered all night over the affair and next morning sent for Mr. Payn. The latter, of course, expected that Washington was going to challenge him to mortal combat. He had visions of a pair of pistols. Arriving at Washington's room, he was amazed to find wine and cheese on the table, of which the young man invited him to partake. Then Washington apologized to the man who had knocked him down. He admitted that he had been in the wrong. Such is Parson Weems' account, who goes on to moralize at length over the story.

An Inference.

"I have lost my best friend," sighed the poet.

"Cheer up. I will loan you my rhyming dictionary."

PEGGING ALONG AS USUAL.

Contemporaries Who Were Unkind Enough to Observe That They Would Like to Attend a Lynching Bee—The Choking Cure.

[Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.]

IT'S early in the winter yet, and yet the whisky in all the saloons of Giveadam Gulch has frozen solid and been thawed out three different times. In a month more we'll be drinking ice water and paying for the other stuff.

The mayor of the town of Lone Jack pulled his gun and fired at a man the other day and killed a dog. The man who invests in real estate in that town is going to get left.

We learn that forty critters loafing around this burg sent a petition to Washington the other day to have us bounced as postmaster under the new administration. It can't be done short of an earthquake, and they might as well quit trying. We might let go of the smallpox, but never of an office.

The Grass Valley Tribune says that the Kicker gives eastern people a false impression of Arizona and thereby hinders new citizens from coming in. We plead guilty. Two months ago the editor of the Tribune legged it for the woods when a man with a gun came in to demand an apology, and we so stated. That isn't Arizona at all.

One of those incidents inseparable from life in a new and patriotic community occurred at the Royal hotel on Tuesday last. A drummer from Chicago found fault with the holes in the tablecloth and carried it to such excess that mine host felt compelled to shoot him through the shoulder. After the bullet had been extracted the drummer decided to apologize. Men who go about picking up trifles must expect more or less trouble.

It is quite likely that from three to five of the mail carriers sent out from this postoffice will be eaten by wolves or bears during the winter, and any one wishing to be on hand as a substitute should hand in his name at an early date. Uncle Sam's mail can't stop because a few employees get chawed up.

Several of our esteemed contemporaries have been unkind enough during the last week to observe that they should like to attend a lynching bee with us as the central figure. They don't like our ways, and we are sorry for it, but it's the way we were brought up, and we can't help it. We have got a spirit of exultation about us that makes us keep on doing things.

"WE HAVE GOT A SPIRIT OF EXULTATION ABOUT US THAT MAKES US KEEP DOING THINGS."

A Certain Individual.

An individual calling himself Texas Jack, who has been hanging around the Gulch for the last two months and bragging of the number of men he has planted, took a walk last night and is now somewhere between here and Florence. The vigilance committee was the cause of it. He said he wouldn't go at first, but after the noose had been tightened on him two or three times he decided to travel. Many things have been tried in the west to move a bad man on, but nothing has been found so effective as a little choking. The change of sentiment produced is almost instantaneous, and rope is wonderfully cheap.

Mr. Henry Millington, a gentleman fifty years old, arrived here from St. Louis last Sunday in quest of information concerning his son William, who was last heard of in this vicinity. With our usual cheerfulness we dropped all work and began an investigation and at the end of an hour was able to assure the anxious father that William lies buried about four miles out on the Dog Creek road. It was about the 1st of October that some cowboys overtook him on a stolen broncho after a pursuit of fifteen miles. The father was more or less affected; but, on the whole, he was glad that William had found rest and peace at last.

At the Hellso Opera House Thursday night the Boston Ideal Theatrical company put on the play of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and gave a fine performance. Of course all the lights in the house were shot out when the proper moment arrived, and of course the boys made Uncle Tom and Legree do a hot act by shooting at their feet; but, on the whole, things passed off beautifully.

Mr. Jack Bristoe, who thinks his mission on earth is to go around righting wrongs, rode over a hundred miles to drop in on us last Monday. According to him, we are wrong, and he had a gun out to right us before we knew that he was in the sanctum. His shooting was so mighty poor that we were ashamed to have to split his right ear with a bullet and scare him out of the office and out of town. He doubtless means well, but he should explain his little jokes in advance.

We feel sorry in a way at being compelled to announce the suspension of the Pine Hill Banner, a weekly paper set afloat about six months ago. We told Brother Harker when he started it that he would have to do some shooting to secure a circulation, but he believed in brotherly love and has come out as we predicted. You can't come out of a sawmill in Wisconsin or a dairy in Ohio and run a newspaper in Arizona on those lines, and you might as well cease trying. Men don't hanker to shoot an editor every day in the week, but when the fit does come on they want to feel that he will shoot back and make things interesting.

Put on No Lugs.

We have always contended that if Colonel Harris and ex-Judge White, both of Grass Valley, ever got into a real hot argument there would be shooting between them. The affair came off three or four days ago. They got to talking about the late political campaign and calling each other liars and renegades, and then each one drew and opened fire. From the noise and smoke created the town figured on having to bury at least ten victims, but when all was over not so much as a coat button had been cut away. All bang and no one hurt. And Arizona is looking for statehood when such farces are being played.

Two weeks ago, after having given proper notice, we turned outdoors the crowd of loafers that has been infesting the mayor's office for the last year and toasting their shins at the expense of the town. As a result we are charged with thinking ourself as mayor too good to associate with the common run, and there are dark threats as to what may happen next spring. We are a plain man. We put on no lugs. We have drunk with a half breed and hunted with a Digger Indian, and if certain white men can't see that we must dignify our office to a certain extent to prevent its being turned into a beer garden we have nothing to say to them.

As mayor of Giveadam Gulch we bounced the city marshal last week, and the place is open to a man of sand who can shoot two handed and who isn't afraid of killing a cowboy or a terror now and then. The job pays $2 a day, and in case of the officer's death while in the line of duty his widow gets a pension.

Mr. Holy Terror Montana, who set out to run this town about two years ago and didn't make a success of it, was hung last week in a small town in New Mexico. Before he left here in obedience to a warning from the vigilance committee we struggled with him like a brother; but, though he talked to us with tears in his eyes, our words had no lasting effect on him. His business was removing humanity to a better clime, and he had pursued it so long that he couldn't change to farming or other peaceful pursuits.

VISITS WITH UNCLE BY Raising Boys.

"No wonder some boys go to th' devil," commented Ab. Wilkins at Baltuff's grocery store. "We've raised a right smart lot of good uns in this town, and then agin we've raised a bunch o' pussley, too! Take George Hancock, fer instance. When I first knew Georgie he was about as big as a pint o' cider, and th' way he used t' cuss was a caution. Got it frum his dad, who would have won the belt fer continuous blasphemy if somebody'd offered one!

"An' every time I went past th' Hancock house and Georgie was about, he'd throw stones at me!

"But he got better after a while, jined the Sunday school and was a-doin' right pert! Folks begin t' plat to him with pride—and then one day as school th' teacher missed her pocketbook and when th' detectives got through with th' case, it was Georgie! But, pshaw! he didn't have no chance. His pa was a chicken thief fer years and ye can't raise good men under sich auspices!"

"It doan't seem," drawled Hank Spotts, ramming his horny finger into his pipe bowl to ignite the unburned tobacco, "thet folks hez much t' do with it, Ab. I recall distinctly Widow Dodge's son out Silver Ridge way. Horace Dodge was as good a boy to begin with as ye ever cum acrost in a hull passel o' boys! But when his pa died, Mrs. Dodge gist sorter lost her grip on that boy. He begun by stayin' out nights, then he got t' keeping bad cump'ny, got drunk once, run away with a patent medicine show—and nobody hain't heard nothin' of him since! Now his pa was a gentleman, as clean as they make 'em and as square as a die!"

"That's all right," argued Ab; "ye kin spoil good apples any time by putting 'em in the barrel with bad uns! Th' hull trouble with Horace Dodge was his mother. I ain't nothin' agin clubs or club women, ner what they do er say, but, by jing, sumtimes I can't help wishin' they'd put as much ginger and thought intew their home affairs as they do intew th' lodge!

"Now, in the first place, Horace Dodge went down town nights becus his ma, who was a mighty good woman, understand, was away 'tending sum club meetin', and th' boy gist nat'rally got lonesome.

"He begun smokin' cigarettes gist as any boy does, and when his ma found it out, she cried. When he got intew bad cump'ny, she called the preacher and the deacon in, and one night when Horace wuz out gallutin' around, they met in her front parlor an' prayed fer two hours fer him! That was th' night afore he run away—and somehow I can't help but think that Horace didn't need prayers half as much as he did a lickin'!

"What his mother should a done was t' kept that boy so busy doin' sumthin' on th' place thet he couldn't find time to loaf around town, and when she smelled cigarettes on him, she should a gone out to the barn and got the calf rope and saved her prayers until arter she had gin him one of the best dressin' downs he ever had!

"If he persisted in bein' ornery, she should 've increased th' size o' th' rope and the number o' applications, gist as the Docs. does in serious cases, leadin' up t' a climax that would o' broke er busted that boy!"

"Mebbe so," grunted Hank, blowing the smoke from the bamboo stem of his cob pipe. "Mebbe so—but I reckon that boys, like everything else, is different at times!

"There wuz 'Squire Dunham's boy, Alonzo. His pa was one o' th' honesest men thet ever seen th' light o' day, and as religious as a testament. They had prayers ev'ry mornin', rain er shine, went t' church reg'lar and lived accordin' t' th' Ten Commandments—that is th' old man and his wife did, and Alonzo did until one day he went into town and cum home so drunk he couldn't drive th' hosses straight!

"That nigh killed Old Man Dunham. He was teetotlar hisself and had lectured a lot agin likker. Nobody knows how the boy happened t' do it t' this day, except thet he'd heard so much about it, that he gist got curious t' see what whisky tasted like!

"An' the 'Squire couldn't stop him! He's runnin' a saloon now, down t' th' Rapids—and his father's heart is broke if ever a man's was!"

"I guess, by gol, y'er right, Hank," admitted Ab. "It's gist another case o' not knowin' which way a frog'll jump frum th' looks o' him! Gimme a chaw er terbacker!"

HOLES IN COMB.

Permit Easier Passage from One Part of Hive to Another.

My bees are all in regular ten-frame hives, well-filled with solid slabs of honey, sufficient to winter three ordinary hives of bees. However, in years past, colonies died just the same, and I was surprised to find the mortality greatest in the hives that contained the most food, writes a West Virginia bee keeper in Bee Culture. I decided that this was due to the fact that, when once these solid masses of honey became cold, the bees were unable to generate heat sufficient to rewarm them. Then with the appearance of a sunny day dozens of bees would leave the cluster and roam about over the surface of these combs. As night approached and the air became cooler these bees once more drew toward the cluster for warmth; but each time this would occur, numbers of stragglers would become isolated from the main cluster and collect together in the form of compact little knots on the surface of the outside combs, where they slowly chilled to death. In this way I found by actual observation that strong hives of bees positively dwindled down to a mere handful and, with a sudden fall of the temperature, they would succumb. I was not prepared to cellar my bees, so I tried the tarred-paper plan and found it all right, except that there was too much labor and expense connected with it; so I started experimenting, with the result that I no longer lose any colonies here in my home yard from the rigor of winter, and it is pretty cool here, too (17 degrees below zero last winter four nights in succession).

Here is just the plan I have hit upon, and the one I mean to follow until somebody shows me that I am wrong: Late in October, after all the honey-flow is past and Jack Frost has cut down all the flowers, I go into my yard armed with only a large nail and a long slender-bladed knife (the type generally known as a "physician's knife" is best). I have the knife whetted to a razor edge. As it is late in the evening I experience no trouble from robbers, so I at once proceed to open the first hive I come to. This done I remove the frames in the center of the hive one by one, and, after shaking the bees off very close to the entrance of the hive, I place the comb firmly against some very solid object and begin by cutting out a circular piece of the honey 1¼ inches in diameter, directly in the center of each comb, replacing each comb as soon as the hole has been made through it, and putting the circular chunks of honey in the pail. Having cut this opening through eight of the frames of honey and brood (always leaving the two outside ones intact) I close the hive and proceed to the next one.

The bees clustering in a hive are compelled to keep each frame of honey warmed to a certain point all of the time or there will be grave danger of the entire hive perishing, it being very similar to a person lying down to sleep upon a block of ice with another block over him. Once the honey becomes chilled through, most of the heat communicated from the bees passes back and forth over or under the frames, especially over them; consequently I think you will agree with me that a hole through each of the central frames is what is needed to remedy this, and concentrate the warmth of the hive.

Since adopting this method of preparing for winter I have not lost a single hive of bees. Two years ago I tried this plan at the home yard on eight hives that were not so well stocked with bees as they should have been, and, to my surprise, they came out in better condition than the ones that were stronger in bees in the fall. Last winter I tried the same plan with 35 colonies, with no loss whatever, and this winter I mean to prepare all the colonies in my home yard in this way, as I have full faith in its merits. However, I would not advise any brother beekeeper to try a large number of hives in this manner as a first experiment, as the locality might have something to do with the success of the plan. One of the very best features of all is the fact that hives treated as above will come out in the spring with at least three more frames of brood than hives at like period that did not have the holes through the frames. The bees always fill in all of these pop-holes before the close of the apple-bloom.

Good Winter Feed.

There is no better winter breakfast for the stock than equal parts by weight of bran, middlings, ground oats, corn meal and meat scraps, to which add its bulk in cooked cut clover hay, and five per cent. of linseed meal. Mix the ground grain with the tea made by cooking the clover.

ATTORNEY GENERAL STRAUS TRAMPED STATE'S WILDS

He Had a Rough Trip in Garrett County Mountains.

The following dream, or the creation of a Baltimore newspaper man's mind appeared in the Sun last Friday:

After he had cut his way through miles of underbrush over lost trails of the Backbone Mountain, going without food and scratching his face and hands upon the dense growth of briars, Attorney-General Straus returned to the city last night.

Mr. Straus went to the mountains west of Oakland to gather data concerning the dispute between Maryland and West Virginia as to the western boundary of this State. West Virginia says it is more than a mile and a half east of the point claimed by Maryland and is now assuming jurisdiction. If the United States Supreme court, before which the case will be argued in October, decides in favor of Maryland the taxable basis of the State will be increased by more than $1,500,000.

In Mr. Straus' grip when he arrived at his office in the Calvert Building was a riding suit not yet two months old, but so ragged and torn that it resembled a relic of many campaigns.

The trip was a steady grind of surmounting obstacles that would have caused one less timid to turn back, but Mr. Straus as leader of the expedition, pushed on with his party when it seemed that to continue would mean spending the night in the forest without food. That he succeeded in locating the Fairfax and Potomac stones, when the trail, especially to the Potomac stone, had been lost for more than 12 years, was due mostly to his determination not to come home without seeing them.

Mr. Straus left this city at 7 o'clock Monday morning, arriving at Oakland in the afternoon. There the expedition was formed and arrangements were made for the trip. State Senator W. McCulloh Brown and former State Senator Richard T. Browning and Mr. E. H. Sincell volunteered to guide Mr. Straus over the mountains, and early Tuesday morning the start was made. Senator Brown surveyed the ground for Maryland in 1897 and 1898 and had not been over the trails since. Mr. Browning is the grandson of the famous Western Maryland pioneer, Browning, who was known as the foremost hunter of the mountains.

The journey was made in several heavy carriages and wagons. No guide or cook was taken along, but lunch was stored in one of the wagons, with implements for cooking coffee. For several miles around the mountain the riding was rough, but before many more miles were traversed the trail became so narrow that the wagons had to be abandoned. Lunch was eaten and the party set out on horseback. Later they found that even the horses could not make their way, and these were tethered on a narrow road alongside of a gulley and left alone.

A torttous climb brought the party to the Fairfax stone, which was placed in 1740 by the commissioners appointed by George II of England and Lord Fairfax.

This is the stone which West Virginia says is the mark of the western boundary of the State.

The grant to Lord Baltimore states that the western boundary of Maryland should be a meridian line running north and south through the first fountain or source of the Potomac. West Virginia says the Fairfax stone marks the source of the Potomac.

Maryland, according to Mr. Straus, claim that as there are forks west of the stone the headwaters could hardly be east of the fork. Maryland claims that the Potomac stone, set near the Potomac spring upon the crest of the Backbone Mountain, marks the headwaters of the Potomac.

Mr. Straus inspected the country and determined to go to the Potomac stone. This proved a more arduous task. The Fairfax stone is on a foothill of the Backbone Mountain and the party had to climb down, first to the horses and then to the wagons, and set out to find a place to sleep. As in all expeditions of the sort, "night came on," and after another climb a mountain inn, set snugly in the fastness of the wilderness, was discovered.

At 7 o'clock the next morning the party set out for the Potomac stone. They had not gone a quarter of a mile when they discovered that horses, wagons and outfit would have to be abandoned. Lunch had been packed, but this was left in the wagons. It is only a mile and a half, airline, from stone to stone, but it took 20 miles of trudging, pushing and crawling for Mr. Straus to reach the Potomac stone.

The timber was cut down 12 years ago and the underbrush and briars had grown so thick that the trail had been obliterated. The party had to move by compass. The briars bit through the gloves of the men and scratched their unprotected faces. Huge logs blocked their paths and broken limbs of trees tore their clothing into strips.

By noon the party was so hungry that all stopped for something to eat. The food had been left somewhere behind—they did not exactly know—and they had to fast. They plunged on hungry, with a heavy rain falling. At 5 o'clock in the afternoon, bruised and hungry, parched with thirst and tired, they struck a small trail, which led to the Potomac stone was found. Never did Stanley welcome the sight of water any more than did these legal explorers. The topography of the country and the exact location of the stone, together with other data, was collected and at 6 o'clock the start was made for Oakland. About 7 o'clock they found the wagons and after eating the lunch ravenously drove to Oakland, arriving there at 10.30 o'clock.

Mr. Straus is enthusiastic about the case and declares that there is no question as to the legal rights of Maryland.

STOYER.

It has been a long time since your columns have shown a report from this community.

The drouth which has been alarming us so much for the past six weeks was temporarily relieved by a refreshing shower Thursday night. A few more such will insure good corn and buckwheat crops.

Harvest preliminaries are now about all completed, and if the weather is favorable for the next week harvesting will begin in dead earnest.

For the last few nights Thomas Melvin has been suffering from severe attacks of nightmare. He seems to be trying to laugh and sleep at the same time. Since Wednesday night when a new son came into his home his joy has been too unbounded to be quelled even by slumbers.

Rev. Nicola Di Stefano spent Saturday night and a part of Sunday in this community visiting friends.

Geo. N. Steyer, who recently completed his bachelor's course in Wesleyan College, is spending the summer at home.

Chas. A. Kidd made a sly trip to Oakland Saturday. It is reported that he had business at the Circuit Clerk's office.

Rev. E. P. Idleman preached an excellent sermon to an attentive congregation Saturday night.

Recently Misses Grace Riley and Bessie Steyer were the guests of Mr. Sanford and Miss Victoria Moon.

The new road law and the heavy hauling together have placed the "good roads" of this community in history.

We notice in last week's Republican that but one Garrett countain has entered for the Oratorical Contest at Mountain Lake Park next Monday. This is but one instance of many where our people stand back and allow golden opportunities to pass by unheeded, and the rewards go into hands of strangers. Garrett has an abundance of talent along all these lines, but it is not going to benefit its possesser or any one so long as it lies dormant. It is by no means a disgrace to participate in these contests, even if beaten, but it is certainly nothing less to allow men from other states to come in and carry off the prizes without our people even entering the contests.

NEW GERMANY.

In spite of the continued drought most of the crops are growing and flouri-hing.

Hay is reported a light crop.

Jacob Brenneman, district supervisor of roads for No. 12, was inspecting roads in this section last week.

Thomas Browning passed through our town Friday enroute to his home from Grantsville, via North Glade.

A number of our young people attended the lawn fete held in the Backwoods.

James Durst was employed several days last week at the home of his brother, C. C. Durst.

Samuel Wiland is constructing a barn for Henry Yommer, of Jennings.

Stephen Broadwater has been seriously ill of rheumatism for some time.

Samuel Otto has purchased his father's farm.

P. P. McAndrews sold a fine team of horses some time ago.

SUNNYSIDE.

Farmers are busy haying, which is, however, a very light crop—scarcely a half crop.

The ex-postmaster of Sunnyside has stopped licking on stamps and devotes all his time to raising beets, peas, cabbage, tomatoes and all sorts of garden truck, having concluded that Uncle Sam can't close that part of the business on him. He claims that growing truck is more honorable than growing politicians.

The autos are raising the dust on this road most every hour in the day and some hours in the night. Benzine buggies appear to be getting very fashionable. Expect Editor Ben will deliver his papers in one next.

STATE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY MEETING

Senator Brown Announces the Summer Meeting of the Society at Mt. Lake.

To the Editor of The Republican:

DEAR SIR: I would like to call the particular notice of your readers to the announcement of the Summer Meeting of the Maryland State Horticultural Society at Mt. Lake Park, on Saturday, July 31st, beginning at 10 a. m.

Every resident of Garrett county is cordially invited to attend. In our county practically every farmer is an horticulturist, and will profit by these meetings.

The coming of our friends from the Eastern Shore, and other parts of Maryland at this time, in part a recognition by them of the share which Garrett county has recently taken in the work of the Society, and of our two recent fine displays of fruit, at the Annual Exhibits in Baltimore. It is for us acknowledge this countesy by turning out in full force at these meetings and show that we have interest in horticulture, and are alive to our advantages.

Don't forget July 31st. Bring all the ladies. Yours truly

W. McCULLOH BROWN,
Pres. Md. S. H. S.

Oakland, Md., July 19, 1909.

GRANTSVILLE.

The farmers have got their wheat in their barns and it is the largest crop they have ever harvested.

Mr. Thos. H. Bittinger was on the sick list last week.

Mr. J. L. Augustine fell off a load of hay and received injuries that confined him to the house for several days.

Mr. Lewis Brenneman sprained his leg by jumping off the train and as a result he is now going on crutches.

Mr. Scott Johns and son, of Meyersdale, Pa., are plastering Mr. J. H. Miller's house.

Messrs. U. M. Stanton and D. W. Dorsey have purchased the planing mill of Christian Zook and are moving it to the railroad near Mr. Stanton's lumber yard. We wish the new firm success.

Mrs. Henry Winterburg and two sons, of Cumberland, are visiting at Mr. Wm. Winterburg's.

Mr. Wm. R. Offutt and family paid a visit to this town on Monday night, coming across the country from Oakland in an automobile.

Mr. C. D. Hershberger made a business trip to Baltimore this week.

Mr. Bert Swauger has a crew of men at work on a concrete wall for his new dwelling house.

Mr. S. R. Frantz and daughter, of Friendsville, were visiting Mr. Frantz's daughter, Mrs. Marshall Beachy, a few days this week. Lup is always a welcome visitor in this burg.

Mrs. Henry Bonig is critically ill at this time.

GORTNER.

Mr. and Mrs. Emanual Hershberger, of near Grantsville, are spending a few days with relatives at this place.

Menno Miller, of Oakland, spent Sunday evening of the guest of J. C. Brenninger.

P. P. Gortner, J. L. Shettler and Roy Becker are engaged in building a house and barn for Fred Gortner near Loch Lynn.

Mr. and Mrs. Chas. F. Killius and children, of Springs, Pa., are visiting their parents, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Killius, at this place.

Abraham Metzler, of Martingburg, Pa., preached several very interesting sermons at the Union church Sunday last.

Mr. and Mrs. Noah Brenneman, of Bittinger, are spend a few days with relatives here.

Bible meeting next Sunday evening at 7.30 o'clock. WILLIE.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

This is a very quiet week with us. There is "nothing doing" until Saturday, when the Maryland State Horticultural Society will convene for a session of two days.

Last Saturday, Sunday and Monday the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society was in session. Sunday morning Dr. W. W. Davis preached an able sermon, after which a large amount was raised for foreign missions.

Saturday the joint debate will take place on the following subject: "Resolved, That all Chinese laborers should be excluded from the United States." Affirmative, Mr. Carl Richards. Negative, Mr. Ping-wen Kno, of Shanghai, China, the famous Christian Chinese Orator. Mr. Richards is a member of the Wooster University Debating Team.

Monday at 8 p. m. the College Oratorical Contest, open to College Students, will be held. Hon. James S. Lakin, of Terra Alta, will give a Gold Medal to the successful contestant.

Tuesday, at 2.30, the Boys' High will give their opening concert, and at 7.30 will be the opening of the 27th Annual Session of the Mountain Chautauqua. At 8.00 an illustrated lecture, "The Panama Canal," will be given by Claud N. Bennett, manager of the Congressional Information Bureau, Washington, D. C.

Wednesday, at 11.00 a. m. lecture by Jos. K. Griffis (Tahan) in Indian costume, and at 8.10 p. m., lecture by Dr. Masuji Miyakawa, of Japan, on "Japan of Today," with stereopticon views and moving pictures.

Thursday, 11.00 a. m., monologue reading by Miss Margaret Stahl, and at 8.00 p. m. a lecture by Dr. Miyakawa on "The Japan of Yesterday," with moving pictures.

The ladies of the Baptist congregation of Loch Lynn held a very successful festival Tuesday afternoon and evening on the veranda of the Hicks House.

Mr. A. Stewart Ingles, of Uniontown, Pa., is at the Mountain Lake Hotel. We hope he may become interested in Park real estate.

Mr. R. S. McCrum, of Uniontown, Pa., who is sojourning at Deer Park, was here one day last week. Mr. McCrum was raised near here and is a brother-in-law of Mr. Jas. W. White of Oakland.

Rev. J. O. Bolton held the quarterly meeting for Dr. Ward at Grantsville last Sunday.

Services in the M. E. church Sunday as follows: Class meeting at 10 a. m.; Sunday School at 2.30 p. m.; Epworth League at 7 p. m., and preaching at 8.

Mrs. Sarah J. Gilbert, accompanied by Miss Speelman of Pittsburg, left for Webster Springs last week to spend a few weeks for the benefit of Mrs. Gilbert's health.

Mr. Adolph Rambeau, of Morgantown, W. Va., is here to spend a short vacation.

The family of J. M Dare, of Parkersburg, W. Va., are in their cottage here.

Mr. W. H. Mallette, by the addition of a large porch, has much improved the appearance of his property opposite the Association office.

A revival has again broken out at Bond, where there were eight conversions this week up to Wednesday night. Rev. Bolton preached there Monday and Wednesday evenings.

Dr. Thistle and family are occupying the Thistle cottage near Overlook Inn.

BITTINGER.

A slight frost touched this section on July 20th and did some damage to the buckwheat crop in some places.

E. S. Brenneman and wife and little daughter spent last Sunday with relatives near McHenry.

Lewis Orendorf and family, of McHenry, were visiting in this village last Sunday.

Henry Duckworth has moved his family to the Henry Platter farm near this place.

Messrs. Peter G. Stark and Patterson Engle and their wives spent last Sunday at the home of Amos Reckner near Beckman.

Harvey Stark has provided himself with a new and complete photograph outfit and he is busy taking snap shots of interesting places about the village.

Farmers are busy this week hauling their wheat into their barns and we hear reports that some farmers will realize a yield of forty bushels to the acre.

Lawrence Bittinger, of Grantsville, was calling on the young ladies in this village last Thursday evening.

Arrangements are being made for the holding of the Annual Lutheran Picnic at this place on Saturday, Aug. 7th. Attorney Hendrickson, of Cumberland, has been engaged to deliver an address in the afternoen and there will be other speakers present also, and it is hoped that we may have an enjoyable time.

ASHER GLADE.

We had very cool weather the past week with plenty of rain.

Nearly all the farmers have commenced the harvest of hay, which is very light in this section.

Mr. Umbel lost a valuable cow a short time ago.

Mr. Owen Evans has a sick horse, which he supposes to have been bitten by a snake.

Messrs. John Wakefield, Commodore Wakefield, Lloyd Wakefield and Christopher Sines, all of Locust Grove, were in this section one day last week picking cherries.

Mr. Robert Augustine, of Somerfield, Pa., was here picking cherries last week.

Some in this vicinity have part of their wheat ground plowed. CARTER.

AUGUST WEATHER.

Rainfall Will Be Below General Average for the Mouth.

The weather for August, as forecasted by Peter R. Smith, is as follows:

The month will have several heated periods which will not reach in excessive heat beyond the ordinary August. No extreme drops of the temperature are likely to show up. The rainfall for the month will be much below the general average unless causes quits remote should appear as factors to bring about rain. Vigorous local showers will visit localities widely separated, and but few of such showers are likely to prevail. Few electric showers will be on passage. Some storms of wind are likely to develop during the heated periods which are more likely to be summer blusters than gales.

At the opening of the month the temperature will be warm, attended with threatening weather. Storms of apparent vigor the 2d will be on passage, charged with bluster and some electricity, but like most of the clouds, deficient in rain. After the passage of the wave a change to a cooler temperature will prevail.

Local storm waves will appear on the 3d, 4th and 5th. Air currents will change their course on the passage of the wave.

A storm wave will be on passage on the 5th and 7th, which may be attended with much thunder. Storms of wind, bluster, and light rains may appear at many places.

On the 11th and 12th local storms will be on passage, but causes producing rain storm will be absent.

On or touching the 15th the temperature will reach a summer climax and a storm wave will center on the 16th, 17th and 18th. A cool wave will show up about the 18th or 19th. Several days of cloudy weather will show up about the 20th, which may be attended with drizzling rains that may be prolonged to the 23 or 24.

The last week of August will be sure to be very warm and storm threatening conditions will appear in black, angry clouds charged with wind and without rain. The temperature will mellow down to pleasant summer weather.

For House of Delegates.

Mr. J. Elbert Chappell, of Kitzmiller, in this issue of THE REPUBLICAN, announced his candidacy for the nomination for the House of Delegates. Mr. Chappell has been a resident of Kitzmiller for the past fifteen years and was engaged for several years as a school teacher. Later he entered the mercantile business and was appointed postmaster at Kitzmiller, which position he still holds. He is married, his wife being a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John H. Rafter. The couple have four interesting children. Mr. Chappell, is nominated and elected, will do all in his power to further the interests of Garrett county at Annapolis.

A Famous Duckpin Game.

A very merry party of Baltimoreans took passage on B. and O. train No. 5 on Saturday, destined for Cumberland. At Camden Station in Baltimore, the boys took possession of the smoking car, preferring to travel in true democratic fashion, and the trip was one of enjoyment and pleasure. Now and then a group would advance upon the inner recesses of the dining car for a cooling draught of Deer Park water, but the confines of the smoking car were in the main, rigidly observed.

The occasion of the trip was to engage in a series of duckpins on the new alleys of the Cumberland Y. M. C. A. on Saturday evening

J. A. Zimmerman, J. F. Donavan, J. H. Goldsmith, E. E. Herold, L. A. Watkins and Walter Wilmer were among the Baltimoreans making the trip. They went back to Baltimore on Sunday, but without, however, winning a single game from Cumberland. H

To Build a Fine Home.

J. E. Watson, prominent in the operation of the Consolidation Coal Company, has let a contract for the erection of a dwelling house in Fairmont that will be one of the finest in that part of West Virginia. He is president of the Watson Company, which is now preparing to erect an eight story office building in Fairmont, which will be the home of the Fairmont Coal Company, a branch of the Consolidation Coal Company. The building will cost $300,000. Mr. Watson is a relative of Mr. Clarence W. Watson president of the Consolidation Coal Company. A building boom is on at Fairmont, a score or more houses being under construction within the corporation limits.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc.

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, AUGUST 5, 1909. NUMBER 23

INSURGENT FACTION WON IN DEMOCRATIC PRIMARIES

The Party Split Asunder And Open War Has Been Declared.

Probably the bitterest contest in the political history of Garrett county took place last Saturday between the Hamill and the Browning factions of the Democratic party, when lines were drawn taunt and war was openly declared by both factions, the Browning forces being under the leadership of ex-State Senator R. T. Browning, while the Hamill, or so-called "insurgents," were generaled by Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, Jr., of Oakland, chairman of the Democratic County Committee. So hot was the contest waged that families were divided, some going into one camp and some into the o her, and in one instance a rupture has occurred between partners who have been successful in their business and a dissolution has resulted.

The polls opened, according to the primary election law, at one o'clock and in every district workers for their favorite tickets were out, neither side asking or granting quarter.

Two tickets were in the field, the Browning faction having placed Messrs. J. J. Bender, of Grantsville, and Dr. E. H. Bartlett and C. A. Deffinbaugh, of Oakland, in nomination, and the Hamill faction having as its candidates for delegates to the State convention Messrs. Thomas J. Browning, of Thaverville; Clarence V. Guard, of Friendsville, and S. K. Schlossnagle, of Accident. The latter ticket won by a majority of 49.

The preliminaries of the actual fight, however, did not occur until Tuesday morning at Oakland, when the committee, under the law, was supposed to meet and canvas the vote and to certify the election to the State Convention of the local delegation. At the hour specified, eleven o'clock, the return judges met at the office of the Orphan's Court, Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, chairman of the committee, being present in his official capacity, and Mr. R. T. Browning, also a member of the committee, as a spectator. Immediately after the judges met to make their return a written protest was handed the chairman in which the legality of the call for the primaries was attacked, setting forth the fact that under the law the committee, and not the chairman, was empowered to make the call; that the notice was published in a newspaper claiming to be independent in its views and not the recognized organ, thereby not giving the proper legal notice to the members of the party, and in other ways attacking the course of the chairman. After reading the protest it was laid aside by the chairman who then entered into a discussion of its merits and held that the call was legal and in form even though it was made by a minority member of the body. The remarks of Mr. Hamill led up to personal matters between himself, Mr. Browning and Dr. E. H. Bartlett. Mr. Browning charged that Mr. Hamill had practiced deception upon other members of the committee in recommending the appointment of Mr. P. A. Chisholm for election supervisor a number of years ago when it was understood that Mr. King Delawder was to be appointed to the place. Mr. Hamill denied the assertion that Mr. Delawder had been promised the place but when the latter supported Mr. Browning in his contention and proved conclusive that he had been approached by Mr. Hamill and had been asked to take the place Mr. Hamill receded from his position by saying: "Maybe I did." At all events Mr. Chisholm was appointed and Mr. Delawder was not.

Dr. E. H. Bartlett then shied his castor into the ring and reminded Mr. Hamill of a promise to have him (Dr. Bartlett) appointed Chief Judge of the Orphans' Court, and then immediately forgot it and had himself appointed, and accepted Mr. Hamill's gage of battle to meet him on the floor of the State convention where the contest will be fought to a conclusive end.

The feeling between the two factions is bitter and is growing in intensity daily.

MR. L. F. GREEN WITHDRAWS

From the Race for Nomination For House of Delegates.

This office was in receipt on Sunday morning of a communication from Mr. L. F. Green, of Grantsville, in which that gentleman expresses his determination to withdraw from the contest for the nomination for House of Delegates from this county and requests THE REPUBLICAN to discontinue his card of announcement, and to state that he is no longer an aspirant. In accordance with Mr. Green's direction his announcement is withdrawn.

The communication from True Blue Republican, as indicated in last week's REPUBLICAN, in which the correspondent intimated that he would have other and more startling comment on Mr. Green's multiferous poltical moves is also on our desk. In view of the fact that Mr. Green is no longer in the field as an aspirant for party honors we withhold the communication upon our own responsibility, but desire to add that accompanying the letter from True Blue Republican was proof positive that Mr. Green was the author of the letters appearing in the Garrett Journal last fall attacking Mr. Taft, the Republican Presidential nominee and now the head of the Republican party of the nation.

MEETING OF THE STATE HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY

Eminent Men Made Addresses and the Gathering Was a Helpful One.

(Special Correspondence)

In accordance with the program of the State Horticultural Society, more than forty members of the Society with their wives left Baltimore on the early morning train on Friday last, getting off at Hancock. There they were the guests of the Tonoloway Orchard Company, of which Mr. E. P. Cohill is president. Carriages were waiting, and the guests were driven for miles through the orchards, after a substantial lunch had been served. These are the largest orchards in the western part of Maryland. Train No. 1 was then taken and the party, now increased to over fifty, arrived at Mt. Lake Park in time to be comfortably housed at the Mt. Lake Hotel.

Saturday was given to the exercises of the Society, and addresses by speakers especially invited for the occassion.

The horticulturists of West Virginia had been invited to join in the meetings, and Mr. S. W. Moore, president of the West Virginia Society gave a most interesting address upon mountain orcharding. Mrs. Patterson, wife of Director Patterson, gave an instructive lecture upon the use of fruit in the household.

In the afternoon Dr. H. W. Wiley, Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, one who is sought after everywhere, spoke upon the "Pure Food Law as Affecting Fruit Products." His address was a feature of the meeting and it was a loss to all who failed to avail themselves of this opportunity of coming to hear him.

Mr. S. L. Lupton's address was upon "Success in Growing and Marketing Fruit." As Mr. Lupton is from Winchester, Va., and is himself an extensive grower, three states were represented by speakers, namely, Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. At the evening session, Mr. W. A. Taylor, who is Assistant Pomologist of the U. S. Department of Agriculture, gave an illustrated lecture, giving an account of what the government has done and is doing to assist fruit growers in the matter of handling and storing. At this lecture Mr. Samuel Lawton, of Oakland, was kind enough to assist with the lantern.

The officers expressed regret that the attendance at these meetings was so small, for it was an opportunity to hear and meet with experts who could and did give many points and facts worth remembering and putting into practice.

On Saturday evening the ladies of Mt. Lake kindly invited the members of the Horticultural Society to a most enjoyable reception.

Resolutions of thanks to Dr. W. W. Davis and the Mountain Lake Park Association were adopted. Many of the members remained over Sunday.

Monday morning the grounds and gardens of the Messrs. Weber were visited and an excursion was made to Conneway's Tower. After seeing the view, Mr. Conneway, who is county vice-president, entertained his guests at a dinner, which they will not soon forget if their expressions of thanks count for anything. The party then returned to Mt. Lake and all left on the 4:23 train for their homes, all loud in their praises of Garrett county and full believers in its possibilities.

The county officers and the secretary of the Society are very anxious that all the farmers of Garrett county will remember the annual exhibit which will be held in the Fifth Regiment Armory in Baltimore, December 2 and 3 next. They desire to obtain a large exhibit from Garrett county which has done so well in the past. Fruit and vegetables can be sent now or at any time (express paid which will be returned by the Society), to The Maryland State Horticultural Society, care of The Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Company, 426 South Eutaw St., Baltimore, Md.

Addressed cards can be obtained from Mr. Jos. M. Conneway, the county vice-president, or from the president, Mr. Brown.

Senator Brown made the address of welcome to the Society as follows:

Fellow members of the State Horticultural Society, Ladies and Gentlemen.

In your name I thank Mr. Davis for his kind welcome of our Society to Mt. Lake Park; we shall gladly accept his hospitality so generously extended.

Now, on behalf of my fellow citizens, I wise to express our appreciation of your presence here today, and to bid you individually, one and all, thrice welcome to Garrett county. We are pleased that our friends from the Eastern Shore and elsewhere, should have availed themselves of this opportunity to see Western Maryland, and we hope that during your stay you may see something of this, the newest and largest county of the State.

In the annual report of our Society for 1900 I find in a paper by Mr. Gould, the following: "So far as I have been able to observe and study the conditions which exist, I believe that the horticultural possibilities in certain sections of Western Maryland are little realized, particularly in some of the mountain districts. There is very little known of the horticultural aspect of Garrett and Allegany counties, but there is every evidence that the possibilities are great, especially in the development of apple culture. The soil, over a large portion of these two counties is well adapted to apple growing. Widely scattered over the territory, are numerous seedling apple trees, many of them old when men now 60 years of age were boys, as hardy and vigorous as an oak. Naturally the fruit on many of these trees is inferior, yet the sturdy vigor and size of the trees are instructive. Nearly every farm has an orchard, and many as high as three hundred to five hundred trees. But for all the large number of trees, no one hears of it as an apple-growing section." And Mr. Stewart, then Industrial Agent for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, in the same report, said: "I expect to see the time when Garrett county will be a strong competitor in the apple and pear, and probably grape markets of the country.

So much for what impartial observers have learned of our conditions and prospects. We in Garrett county feel justly proud of what we have done to prove in part the truth of these predictions. Those who were fortunate enough to attend the handsome display of our Society at the Fifth Regiment Armory will acknowledge that the exhibits of our county were creditable, and by twice winning the premium for the best collection of apples from any county of the State, we have proved that the variety and quality of our fruit is excellent. While all this is true, our people have not awakened to the possibilities before them. Every farmer has an orchard, but in it he seems to desire to have every variety to be found in the nurseryman's catalogue, and unfortunately a great percentage of these varieties are either summer and early fall fruit, or else not well adapted to our climate, which closely resembles that of New England and Northern States.

The result of the policy which I have described is, that during the summer and fall the ground is covered with fallen fruit which goes to waste. The cider and apple butter mills are not running to utilize this waste. The farmer tries to sell a little, but as his neighbors are also in the same position, the only market that he finds is for a limited quantity at the railroad or the county towns. He becomes discouraged and when the later apples come along, he is apt to shake the trees, take a few loads to the cider mill, put some away for his own winter use and let the remainder rot. I venture the statement that one cannot buy and collect at any one point in our county at present a car load of apples of one variety. My interest in horticulture has been directed for the past six years to endeavor to bring about a change in these conditions.

I have endeavored to show our own people that we do raise good fruit which could enter competition any where with success, and to show to the outside world that the soil, climate, and conditions were here, which with cheap land, and favorable railroad connections would make the fruit industry upon a commercial scale, profitable.

I have not yet convinced the farmers of Garrett county of the real value of a few chosen varieties of late keeping apples, over our present miscellaneous assortment, and of the necessity of having those chosen in considerable quantity of one kind. When they do awaken to this truth, then the dawn of a new era will begin, orchards of commercial size will be set out, and the county will have started upon a development which should be one of her leading industries.

My friends, in coming among us and noting conditions as they are, please bear in mind the newness of our county. The average farmer of over fifty years that you will meet has gone into the forest and carved out for himself a home. it was a long and stern fight against great disadvantages, as I can testify from personal experience. So if our farms seem small, remember that our county is as yet but partially developed. But a few years back the log house was common, and the occupants then, as now, were self-reliant and skilled in many ways. It was not unusual to divide the trades between members of the family; one was carpenter, one blacksmith, another shoemaker, and so on; while from the ceiling joist hung skeins of many colored woolen yarns, the work of the women of the family, fresh from the spinning wheel, and which would be knitted into socks and mittens in the long winter evenings, or made into genuine home spun garments upon the loom which was a fixture in nearly every large and prosperous family. The long barreled, homemade muzzle loading rifle always hung upon forked pegs close to the door-way, and many antlers of varying size bore testimony of the chase. In a few homes the crane and the Dutch oven were still in use, relics of real pioneer days.

Such surroundings as these were common fifty years ago, but now have gone, and the county is making rapid strides in development, which will be permanent and substantial, while in addition to our agricultural progress, our mineral wealth has hardly had its surface scratched as yet.

One mark of progress in a community is seen in its public buildings, and I trust that before you leave you may visit Oakland, and see this recent expression of our progress.

To our fellow horticulturists of West Virginia, I wish especially to express our pleasure at this opportunity of meeting them, and of having them with us today. By so many ties and conditions are we of Western Maryland bound to you, that it is eminently fitting that we should join hands in this our summer outing.

MOUNTAIN CITY IS NOW BURNING NATURAL GAS

A Spectacular Demonstration Here Saturday Evening.

Last Saturday evening, as was announced by the local officials of the Northern Natural Gas Company through the medium of the press and also by invitations issued by the company, Oakland witnessed a spectacular demonstration of the power of natural gas as an illuminant.

For the purpose of the demonstration a large pipe was laid from the gas main on Third street to a point near the top of the hill below the old court house. Here a standpipe some fifty feet high was erected and on the top was placed a "T" with the ends open so that at the proper time the gas could escape and be fired. At eight o'clock the Mountain City Band went to the office of the company on Second street where an open air concert was held which lasted fifteen or twenty minutes. From the company's office the band marched to Fourth street, followed by an immense crowd and at 8.30 the gas was turned into the main and a few minutes later was fired by Mr. C. C. Culbertson, of Piedmont, with a rocket. The flames from the top of the pipe immediately flashed out and two immense arms of fire reaching out and high into the air illuminated the entire town and a great portion of the surrounding country. The light given forth by the flaming gas was a revelation to the people. It was soft, but brilliant, and for a few moments during the demonstration pressure approximating eighty pounds was turned into the pipe. The roar following was almost deafening and nervous people who were in the immediate neighborhood of the standpipe left in a hurry, evidently fearing something unforseen was about to happen and deeming it unsafe to remain in the neighborhood.

Hundreds of people were here from Deer Park, Mountain Lake Park, Terra Alta and the country surrounding town. All were pleased with the entertainment afforded them. The crowd was so great that it was almost an utter impossibility to get along the streets.

Mr. H. V. Thomas, of Buffalo, the president of the company, surprised the local officials by making an unexpected visit, arriving here an hour before the demonstration was to occur. He expressed his appreciation of the good will of the Oakland people and stated that his company was determined to give only the best service.

On June first the Gas Company commenced the piping of their product from their main line at a point near Gormania, a distance of twelve miles, to Oakland, and the work of piping Oakland was commenced on June 20. The town system of pipes is as perfect as it is possible to make it. Every street has its mains and the company is prepared to place its product in every building. Those present at the demonstration in Oakland Saturday night who are connected in an official capacity with the company, are as follows: Mr. H. V. Thomas, of Buffalo, N. Y., president; Mr. J. D. Northrup, of Cumberland, general manager; Mr. J. B. Cheuvront, superintendent of the Oakland plant; Mr. F. M. Robey, paymaster; Mr. C. C. Culberson, superintendent of the Piedmont plant; Mr. Harry Stover, superintendent of the Keyser plant; Mr. Thomas H. Morgan, of Frostburg; Latimer Bradley, of Piedmont, and Mr. H. H. Taylor, of Keyser.

Lime. Lime. Lime.

Any one wanting lime for fall crops write W M. Bishop, Terra Alta, W. Va., for prices delivered at your nearest railroad station, either in lump or granulated. Analysis of this limestone shows 89.95 carbonate of lime. We have limestone in this section that only shows 66.89 carbonate of lime. It does not require any more labor to put the high grade lime on your land and you get about 25 per cent. more lime from every ton used, or you would get as much pure lime from fifteen hundred pounds of the high grade lime as you would from two thousand pounds of the lime that only shows 66.89 carbonate of lime, therefore you handle five hundred pounds more of the low grade lime in very ton to get the same result, which is quite an item to the farmer.

Bowling Tournament.

Oakland defeated Mt. Lake in a ten-pin match on Monday night at the Mt. Lake bowling alleys. Three games were played, Oakladd taking the first, Mt. Lake the second and Oakland the third. The Mt. Lake players were C. McGowan, L. Ayler, M. Jacobs, R. Harrison and W. Davidson. The Oakland team M. Sincell, J Grimes, J. Helbig, M. Boyle and R. Thayer. Last night a series of games began between the Piedmont and Mt. Lake teams.

MR. D. L. SLOAN FOR JUDGE

In the Absence of a Local Candidate He is Favored.

To the Editor of THE REPUBLICAN.

It seems that Garrett county will have no candidate to present to the Judicial Convention to succeed the Hon. A. Hunter Boyd, and such being the case, I think it wise to call the attention of the Republicans of the county to the candidancy of a gentleman from our sister county of Allegany who aspires to the high and lofty position of Chief Judge in this Circuit. I refer to Mr. D. Lindley Sloan, of Cumberland. This gentleman has reached the age where calm judgment reaches its ful development, and he is rightly recognized as the leader of the younger element of the Allegany bar. He is fitted, both by education and temperment to fill the the position, and possesses all the qualifications necesary to make a wise and careful jurist. He is, by far, the strongest candidate suggested for the Republican nomination, and with a united party behind him will be elected by an overwhelming majority. Mr. Sloan comes of a family that has been long identified with the growth and development of Allegany county, and the Republican party will make no mistake in selecting him as its candidate for the bench. In addition to his legal attainments and recognized ability he is a man of spotless reputation and character, and his elevation to the bench will add lustre to a long line of eminent men who have presided over the courts of this circuit.

Yours respectfully,

LINCOLN REPUBLICAN.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. JAMES W. PROUDFOOT.

The announcement of the sudden death of Mrs. Jas. W. Proudfoot, at the home of her son Mr. William H. Mallett, in Mt. Lake Park, Monday evening at six o'clock, will be received with great regret by all who knew her. Mrs. Proudfoot had been ill for some months past, but had recently almost recovered her usual good health. Mrs. Proudfoot was thrice married, her first husband being a Mr. Mallett, and the two elder children, Mr. Will Mallett and Mrs. Matson now both at Mt. Lake Park, survive from the first marriage. Her second husband was a Mr. Henry Russell of near Oakland, and to this union was born one son, Thomas Russell, a well known young man of Grafton. The third husband is Mr. J. W. Proudfoot of Grafton, a well known B. & O. bridge carpenter, who at the time of the death of Mrs. Proudfoot, was in Weston, visiting his daughter, Mrs. Barnes. Mrs. Proudfoot was a most estimable lady, a good christian, a devoted wife and mother, and was held in high regard by all who knew her. During her residence in Oakland she made many warm friends, all of whom will be shocked and saddened by the news of her death. The funeral took place at Fairmont yesterday afternoon.

DR. J. G. BUTLER.

Died, at his residence in Washington, D. C., last Monday, of heart failure, Rev. Dr. J. G. Butler, aged eighty-three years. The deceased was a native of Cumberland and has for the past forty years visited Oakland or Mountain Lake Park annually. He had a large circle of friends and acquaintances in Garrett county and the news of his demise was received here with expressions of regret.

MRS. MARGARET LEE.

Mrs. Margaret M. Lee, wife of John S. Lee, of Oakland, and daughter of Mr. and the late Mrs. George W. Ward, died at her home here last Sunday morning at three o'clock of typhoid fever, after an illness of three weeks, aged thirty-five years. The deceased was a most excellent woman, a devoted mother and a kind and loving wife. Her death was a sad blow to her family and was followed on Monday by the death of her bright three year old son, Carl Ward Lee, who also died of typhoid fever. The funerals of both mother and son were conducted on Tuesday by Rev. J. B. Workman, assisted by Rev. John M. Davis, at St. Paul's M. E. church and the interment was made in the Oakland cemetery. Besides her husband Mrs. Lee is survived by her father and three children, the youngest being less than two weeks old.

Call for Your Letters.

DRIVING A NAIL.

Much Skill Necessary to Do It and to Do It Well.

The driving of a nail is deemed so simple a matter that inability to do the job is often spoken of as though typifying entire lack of mechanical ability; yet it may be that some skilled mechanics have something to learn in regard to this elementary operation. It usually takes a wood worker's apprentice a year or more to learn that he doesn't know how.

A fledgling mechanic, who spoke sneeringly of a man whom he heard using several blows of the hammer to drive a single nail, was somewhat crestfallen when told that the nail would hold better when driven "home" by several light taps than when driven by one heavy one.

"Why?" he asked in surprise.

"Because," said the other, "when you drive a nail home with a heavy blow, it is apt to rebound a trifle, loosening the grip of the wood fibres on it. Drive it almost down, if you will, with as hard blows as you wish, but finish the job with several light blows."

One who thinks that the driving of a nail simply consists in getting the whole length of it out of sight has little conception of the real nature of the operation. A nail driven by an expert will often hold several times as much as one ill driven: while, too, it is often made to draw the parts into place. If you have ever watched a mechanic driving nails you have doubtless noted that he rarely drives one at right angles with the face of the work. There is a reason for this. Suppose that he is nailing the sheathing on the frame of a building, and desires to draw it down tightly against the one below it: he points the nail downward, and a few well directed blows at the last produce the desired effect. If the board is bent edgewise, so that much force is required, probably he will start the nail in the upper edge, pointing very sharply downward. Again two nails driven in a board at different angles will hold it in place much more firmly than the same nails would if they were driven in at right angles with the face of the board.

Did you ever notice that in driving a nail in very hard wood one man will do it successfully, while another succeeds only in doubling the nail up before the point has fairly entered the wood? The difference lies in the fact that the expert strikes the nail fairly and not too hard, "coaxing" it in, while the other strikes too hard and with indirection. It may be profitably mentioned right here that in driving a nail into very hard wood it is usually profitable to dip the end into oil or grease. This will not sensibly interfere with the holding qualities of the nail, while it will very materially facilitate its driving.

In order that a nail may hold its best, it is necessary that the pieces it penetrates should be in close contact. A few well judged taps of the hammer at the finish will serve to bring about this contact, while a heavy ill-judged blow will often destroy it, on account of the rebound.

So, too, the direction in which a nail goes is governed not merely by the direction in which it is started, but very largely by the shape of the point. You have doubtless noticed how a horseshoe nail, by having a chisel point, is made to swerve and to come out of the hoof but little above the shoe. By filing the point of a nail off on one side, it may readily be made to take a curved course in driving, or the same result may be attained by bending the point slightly with the claws of the hammer. Two boards may be secured, edge to edge, by nails bent in this way.—Scientific American.

For Happiness.

The real secret of happiness is to be in love with your job; to do the work that you like to do; that interests you; that you believe in.—President Eliot.

THE ARMY DESERTER.

He Is a Marked Man and His Chances of Escape Are Few.

"The most persistently trailed law-breaker in the United States today is the deserter from the army," said a captain of the United States army.

"From the time he is found missing at the post where he is stationed until the inevitable hour when a officer of any of a dozen different federal and civic denominations lands him in custody he is a criminal marked for punishment, and he is shrewd indeed if he escapes.

"Four-fifths of the deserters are foreign born and professional army deserters with bad records left behind them in Europe. These men, as I understand it, deserted from armies in the old countries, came here in search of work, didn't get anything to suit them and joined our forces only to get tired and want to quit again. What they get in the end is a term in the guardhouse or in the national prison for bad soldiers.

"Beside the chances of an escaping soldier to get away from his punishment that of an ordinary jailbreaker, hounded by civil officers, is a bagatelle. In the first place, a soldier in or out of uniform, is a soldier in habits and carriage, with the telltale step and mannerisms of the service. The lockstep of the state prison will wear away because it is only an incidental of prison life, and the convict doing time can do it more or less perfectly, according to his inclination and the watchfulness of the guard, but the whole lire of the soldier is soldiering, and he can never get away from it.

"Now turn a man so marked out in the world with a fifty dollar reward on his head and send to every village postoffice, police station, constable, sheriff and United States marshal in the country his accurate description and a picture of him in two attitudes and you have placed him in the predicament of the deserting soldier and narrowed his chances to an infinitesimal bit of progress within fifty miles of the starting point without arrest."

The captain said that more money was probably spent by the government in advertising a deserter than the reward of $50 offered for his capture.—Washington Herald.

Holidays.

The joys of our holidays, who can measure them? The present pleasure of the days themselves is not the only, not the chief, enjoyment. The schoolboy's anticipation of the sports of vacation is to be added to the pleasure of vacation itself—and then the memory of it after it is past, how much more this memory adds to the sum total of the enjoyment which the vacation brings! The schoolboy remembers the afternoons at the swimming-pool, the happy days in the woods or by the stream long after he has forgotten the irksome duties of school or farm; the same boy, grown older, remembers with pleasure the victories of the college athletic field long after he has forgotten how to conjugate useless Greek verbs; and the same man in later life—if he is a sportsman—recalls more often and with more satisfaction the day he caught his record-breaking salmon, or shot his first moose, than he does the day when he was elected to office, or when he cleared up a few thousands in a stock transaction.—Samuel Merrill in Forest and Stream.

Farm for Sale.

THE PARANOIAC.

Queer Delusions That Come With This Curious Mental Disease.

"That curious form of mental disease known as paranoia is seldom or never cured," said a noted Chicago alienist.

"A paranoiac may be able to transact business with a fair degree of efficiency, but, as a rule, few of this class can be made to stick to work, as the nature of the malady prevents concentration of mind. One so possessed is afflicted with strange delusions, especially with the notion that he is being persecuted. Many an individual who is denominated a crank has paranoia. In general these unfortunates are misanthropic, have no social intercourse with their fellows and are brooding and introspective. Very often their mania leads them to the notion that they have been born to lead mankind in a religious way, and they proclaim themselves prophets of God. Quite often, too, they are discoverers of some wonderful invention that will astonish the world.

"It was a paranoiac who followed the great actress, Mary Anderson, from place to place, declaring himself her favored suitor and threatening to kill any man who sought her company. These threats were what led to the locking up of the demented creature, and I believe he finally shot one of the asylum attendants. Paranoiacs very frequently develop homicidal tendencies, and it is prudent to watch them at all times."—Baltimore American.

Pastor's 50,000 Mile Drive.

At this morning's service in the Union church at Neffsville, the Rev. Dr. E. J. Fogel announced his resignation as pastor of the Reformed Congregation at that place.

Dr. Fogel has served the Jordan charge, which includes three churches besides Union, for 42 and a half years, and during this time he calculates that he has driven 50,000 miles in attending to the needs of Union church alone. He has baptized over 800 children, confirmed 900, officiated at 642 funerals and preached over 1,100 sermons at this one church.—Allentown Correspondent, Philadelphia Press.

Sea Foam Fudge (Nut).

Put into a saucepan three cupfuls of light brown sugar, a cupful of cold water and a tablespoonful of vinegar. Bring this to the boil gradually and do not stir after it is once heated. Boil steadily, and when a little of it dropped into water forms a hard ball, take from the fire. Beat stiff the whites of two eggs and when the sirup has stopped bubbling pour in on these and beat well. When it begins to stiffen, flavor with one teaspoonful of vanilla and add a cupful of chopped nut kernels—hickory, pecan or English walnuts. Drop on paper or turn into a greased pan and mark off in squares or triangles.—Delineator.

FARM AND GARDEN

A HANDY DEVICE.

For the Storing of a Small Quantity of Seed Corn.

Here is a simple arrangement for keeping choice ears of seed corn.

Take a two-inch square timber for the upright, and make a solid base by boring a hole through the two base pieces, then drive the timber into it. Drive four-inch spikes through the upright at intervals of six inches from four sides, and stick the ears of corn on these spikes by thrusting the same into the butt of the cob. Numbers may be placed above each spike, so that records can be kept of all the corn, suggests Farm and Home. The corn should be placed on this rack as soon as picked and husked, and may be left here until planting time if the rack is placed in a dry room where rats and mice cannot get at it.

WHERE FALL PLOWING FAILS.

Not Every Soil Is Suited to Breaking Ground Before Winter.

Much has been said through the columns of the Prairie Farmer about the conservation of moisture and fertility of the soil, writes a Rock county (Neb.) correspondent. Two things you have recommended and urged more than all others, namely, fall plowing and the preservation of the humus in the soil by the addition of stable manure. The methods used and urged are undoubtedly practical in a large part of the west; but in this particular section, where we have a light, sandy soil, a light rainfall, and are subject to prolonged windstorms, the question is more complicated, or rather has different complications.

Seven out of every eight of the fields in this county would be ruined in three or four years if they were to be plowed in the fall and harrowed smooth and left exposed to the winter and early spring winds. I know of many old fields that will not grow enough weeds to cover them, and in many instances are adjoining fields that have produced more grain and have been in cultivation for more years, that are still producing from 20 to 30 bushels of corn and in some cases as high as 40 bushels.

The difference is all due to the fact that the one has been repeatedly left exposed to the sun and wind, while the other has been protected by the stubble, the stalks or weeds, often through no forethought of the owner. I have seen pieces of good land plowed, planted to corn, carefully cultivated, the crop gathered and the stock turned in to work the stalks down, and as a result the wind has been busily carrying off the very cream of the soil on every windy day through the fall, winter and spring till planting time, when the operation would be repeated.

With good wild hay at two to three dollars per ton, no one can afford to cut up his corn or pasture the frozen stalks. They are worth too much more as a protection to the precious soil.

SAN JOSE SCALE.

Spraying with Lime-Sulphur the Most Effective Treatment.

Prof. L. R. Taft of Michigan says that while other remedies have been used for San Jose scale, nothing has been found which equals the sulphur-lime mixture in safety, cheapness and effectiveness, and besides it is worth all it costs as a fungicide.

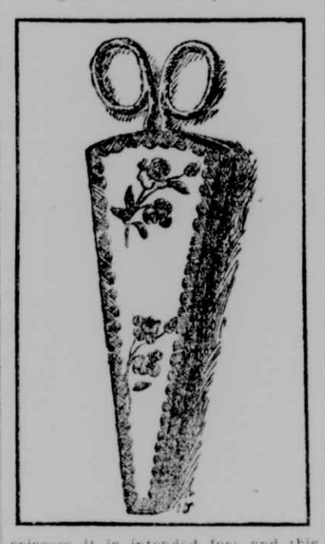
Although equal parts of lime and sulphur can be used, it is better to use 20 to 25 pounds of lime and 15 pounds of sulphur for 50 gallons. These should be boiled for 45 minutes, care being taken to have the water hot before the lime and sulphur are added, and to use only stone lime. The cooking can be done in iron kettles, or by means of steam in barrels or tanks. It answers very well if the lime and sulphur are cooked in 20 to 25 gallons of water and then diluted, using cold water if more convenient. Although it is necessary to have the mixture slightly warm when applied, it need not be very hot.

The best time for making the application is just before the buds open in the spring, and little or no harm will be done by spraying even after the buds show a pink color. In fact, if applied at that time there will be no occasion for using Bordeaux mixture until after the fruit has set.

Shrinkage of Hay in Stack.

At the Arizona experiment station in 1906, 25,530 pounds of new mown hay, cut on five different dates from April 19 to November 9, remained in the stack until February 11, 1907, when the loss due to shrinkage amounted to 2,825 pounds, or 11 per cent. The following season the third crop of hay, amounting to 23 tons, 1,796 pounds, was stacked about July 20. By December 14 a shrinkage of five tons, 871 pounds, or 23 per cent., had taken place.

FOR THE MOURNING WIDOW.



Dull Veiling Used Instead of Customary Crape Gown.

One of the late approvals for widow's mourning is to substitute an extremely fine quality of dull veiling for the customary crape gown. The veiling lends itself to present modish lines with more graceful effect, it is thought. Dull black serge now answers for the short street costume. Indoor dress nowadays permits the wearing of black crepe de chine, silk voile, black net, as well as mousselines and chiffons. There is no change of model in such costumes from those worn by persons out of mourning. It suffices that the all blackness of effect, together with a lessening of ornamentation and avoiding going into extremes of any kind, be discreetly observed. Now and then, from personal choice, some very outre mourning attracts attention, both indoors and out, but that in no way is to be taken as countenanced by the best dress authorities or adopted by women of elegance. There is one point markedly observed by all women who understand the conventional requirements of dress, and that is, that the mourning worn by women on the sunny side of 40 and 50 is no longer of the kind which should be worn by their elders. What is called youthful mourning, like all dress for young persons, has its margin held wider and freer than all others.

KEEP SCISSORS IN CASE.

Design for Ornamental and Useful Contrivance.

Good scissors should always be kept in a case, and as many of them are sold without cases, such a little ornamental one as we show here will be found useful. Its size and shape must, in a great measure, depend on the scissors it is intended for; and this can easily be ascertained by tracing round them when they are laid flat down.

Two pieces of cardboard are covered with silk that has been painted or embroidered with some pretty little design; line each with plain silk and bind the edge with narrow ribbon or else work round in buttonhole, forming tiny scallops. Narrow sarcenet ribbon is then seamed to each edge to form a border that separates the two sides.

Turbans and Muffs.

There is some comfort in the thought that when the huge fur turbans do go out of first style, which is only a matter of a few weeks, they will come in excellently for muffs. In this way a woman will not feel that she has thrown away money.

A good many of them already feel this discouragement when they remember the $20 paid for a good fur turban the first of the year, and the thousands now selling at three dollars apiece.

This is the kind of thing that makes a woman of moderate means glad she waited until the first rush of the season was over to put her dress allowance into a hat or a suit.

Wall Pin Holders.

Wall pin holders made of half yard strips of four-inch wide satin ribbon are lined with broadcloth and weighted with four-inch lead oblongs. The upper end of the ribbon is gathered under a huge butterfly bow, from which depend two inch wide ribbon streamers of even length, terminating with satin wound rings through which safety pins may be thrust. A third and shorter streamer terminates with a small circular toilet pin cushion. At the back of the butterfly bow is a substantial hanger, and as this little affair may readily be rolled and tucked away in any corner of a bag it is an ideal traveling convenience.

Fur-Edged Skirts.

There is a revival of an old fashion this season to edge skirts with fur bands.

This will suit admirably for the woman who has odd bits of fur that she does not know how to use. One band may be added or two or three. These should not be put on short skirts, but on those worn for dress occasions.

To Still Unnecessary Noises.

If you wind an embroidery hoop with ribbon—after having padded it thickly with cotton batting—finish it with a ribbon bow and hang it on the right knob of the door that the wind is sure to blow shut, it will save the catch from clicking, and, incidentally, save the nerves of the susceptible woman.

ON MAKING PRETENSES

THE girl who could eat chocolates, continue her embroidery and talk at the same time necessarily held the floor, her versatile talents giving her the right to do so.

"Double personalities!" she sniffed. "I don't see why they make such a fuss over a simple affair like that! Why, any girl who has any pride at all in her achievements has a dozen personalities, and in any one of them she would have to be introduced to her real self if they chanced to meet! If you are going to be a success you simply can't afford to be your real self all the while, you know.

"In the first place, half the people you met wouldn't understand you, half the rest would be bored, and two-thirds of the remainder would go away and talk about you.

"I'm not speaking of relatives, because usually they are the least acquainted with you of anybody. Why, I've met utter strangers with whom in five minutes I was more in accord than with all the cousins and aunts and what-not I'd known all my life.

"But that isn't what I started out to say. We girls show our variegated assortment of selves more distinctly according to the man who happens to be calling on us or taking us out somewhere. Yes, you do, Annie!" she broke off, accusingly, glaring at a girl who looked rebellious.

"I hope," said the rebellious girl, a little stiffly, "that I have character enough and sense enough not to try to deceive—"

"Oh, that's all right," broke in the girl who was doing the talking. "I've no doubt you have a perfectly glittering rock-bound strength of character, but I'd like to know what good it does you when Henry dawns on your horizon. Why, you know you take no more interest in the state of the pig-iron market than you do in the color of the toga Julius Caesar wore to breakfast on Mondays, yet you resolve yourself into a regular blank phonograph record into which Henry pours an account of what pig iron sold for last week, and what it is going to sell for next week, and how he is slaying it single-handed.

"At discreet intervals, when he has to catch his breath, you repeat snatches of his own remarks to him and generally admire him for his sagacity. Henry simply has got to have some one admire him and you know right well if you didn't do it he'd hunt up some girl who would. He demands adoration and you supply the best, hand-made, all-persuasive, saccharine brand on the market, and if you keep it up faithfully he's sure to marry you in the near future."

"I think you are perfectly horrid!" flared the object of these remarks.

"We all do it," pursued the first girl, calmly. "There's the man who prides himself on his ability to understand women. Instantly in his presence a girl becomes a little helpless and appealing. There is a look in her eyes as she glances at him that asks him to spare her inexperience and her simplicity, because all her sweet young life she knows is as an open book to him. This makes him feel good. He likes metaphorically to pat her on the head and murmur: 'Fear not, little girl! Though I know you better than you know yourself, yet will I not take advantage of my knowledge. I will act just as if you were as clever as I am.'"

"If you're trying to hit me," spoke up the blonde girl, excitedly, "I don't think it is very nice of you! I never look at Arthur that way, nev—"

"And then," went on the talker, "when a blustering, gruff man comes along who maintains that he is perfectly independent of sympathy and despises the gentler graces, we adopt a hail-fellow-well-met air and a ladylike cynicism. We cultivate a nice little bitter twist to our lips and a shrug to our shoulders. Oh, we are seasoned, disillusioned, cold spectators of a disappointed world, and many many times have we thought the very thoughts he is putting into words so forcefully. Yes, indeed! We make ourselves into a slightly dimmer replica of him as he is mentally.

"Then, if a man comes along who is frothy and epigrammatic, we have the muse of comedy beaten a mile so far as a smile goes. We sparkle. We effervesce. If we don't sparkle naturally we put up such a good imitation it would deceive an expert. That is really the most wearing kind of man to live up to. I don't know anything more tiresome than having to be giddy when you feel like a freight car full of Henry's beloved pig iron.

"Say," ended the girl who was doing the talking, "wouldn't it be easier if there were only one pattern of man, instead of a few thousands?"

"I'm sure," said the blonde girl still spitefully, "that I'm fond of all my friends! I don't understand you in—at all!"

"I suppose not," said the girl who had been talking with a sigh. "I love you, Arline, but you really don't begin to be entitled to be the center of the second act of the entire population I spoke about at first!"—Chicago Daily News.

GLORIOUS DEVONSHIRE

One of England's Beauty Spots.

It is indeed surprising to find how unfamiliar the English are as a race with the beauties of their own country. How many of them spend their holidays on the continent in search of beautiful scenery, not knowing that within easy access they have scenery difficult to equal and practically impossible to supersede.

The glorious county of Devon is literally teeming with beauty spots the climax being reached in the delightful little twin villages of Lynton and Lynmouth, nestling between precipitous hills and ending in the gigantic rockbound cliffs which skirt this portion of the Bristol channel.

Blackmore's romantic novel of Lorna Doone" and Whyte-Melville's "Katerfelto" have done much to make these beauty spots familiar to us, and those who travel to Lynton and Lynmouth via coach from Minehead can acquaint themselves with most of the points of interest with which the readers of these two famous novels are familiar.

Leaving Minehead we pass varied and beautiful scenery till we arrived at the quaint little village of Porlock, where we pulled up at the picturesque "Ship Inn." Two additional horses are here attached, for we have a very steep climb of several hundred feet before we reach our next stopping place, and even with the six horses we now have the ascent is none too easy. Behind us we see gradually disappearing the exquisite vale of Porlock, on the right are the gleaming waters of the Bristol channel, whilst on the left we obtain glorious views of hills and moorland.

At Yearmoor Moor the horses are changed, and the rest of our journey through Somerset past County Gate into Devon is indeed one of the loveliest. On our right we still have the Bristol channel, and on our left breezy Exmoor, and if we have selected a fine day for our journey we experience an indescribable feeling of exhilaration as we inhale the pure air of the moors and enjoy the beauties of hills and coombes surely unequaled elsewhere.

If we have chosen the autumn for our visit, we revel in a wealth of glorious color that is indescribable; mile after mile of purple heather intermixed with brilliant golden grose, and a glimpse of Exmoor under these conditions is never to be forgotten, whilst if fortunate we may catch a glimpe of the red deer for which the district is so famous. After a glorious ride of about twenty miles we reach Countesbury Foreland, and we now commence our descent into Lynmouth. On our left are towering hills, whilst on our right is a sheer drop into the sea of several hundred feet, and we hold our breath as the coach gradually descends the steepest hill in England, till the rushing waters of the Lyn remind us that we are nearing our destination. The coach stops at the Lynbridge hotel, where visitors to Lynmouth alight, and one and all agrees that the latter part of the journey has left an impression that nothing will ever efface.

The coach is now lightened of much of its luggage, and the horses start on their arduous climb to Lynton, several hundred feet above, and here again the impression created is most profound.

And now for a few words about these exquisite villages immortalized by Shelby, Southey and others of our poets, and eulogized by Gainsborough among famous painters.

Nestling between gigantic hills is the tiny village of Lynmoth, its one street skirted by the East Lyn, whose waters rush and tumble over the rocks in their haste to reach the sea, and here stretched before us is a scene of loveliness.

On our right reaching far out to sea is the gigantic headland of Countesbury Foreland, whilst on our left are stupendous cliffs covered with brilliant-hued flowers or wooded almost to the water's edge.

If we retrace our steps and follow the course of the Lyn, in a few moments we find ourselves in a scene of beauty, and we can wander along the banks for several miles lost in wonderment at the glories opening out before us.

Below is a ravine down the center of which is a rushing stream, the bed of which is strewn with huge rocks, round which the water whirls and lashes itself into foam. On either side are precipitous hills densely wooded, and we here and there obtain a glimpse of banks of gigantic foxgloves and other wild flowers, whilst near the water's edge are ferns in bewildering variety, some of which are almost tropical, reaching a height of nearly six feet.

A walk of about two miles brings us to the famous "Waters meet," where the Coombe Water joins the Brendon Water in a succession of beautiful falls, and the grandeur and manifold beauties of the scenery at this point may tempt us to remain here till we are ready to resume our journey back to Lynmouth.

Should, however, we decide to proceed, we can follow the Brendon Water for another four or five miles through scenery momentarily growing more beautiful until we at length reach Doone valley, where we can explore many of the points of interest referred to in Blackmore's novel, including the famous Waterslide, and the tiny church at Oare, in which Lorna and Jan Kidd were married. There are two or three routes by which we can wend our way homeward, each equally beautiful, but as we are probably tired, we may find it advisable to charter one of the carriages which ply for hire near the entrance of Doone valley.

A tiny cliff railway for a small cost will take us from Lynmouth into Lynton near the North walk, probably the finest coast walk in the kingdom. Cut in the face of the cliff between six and seven hundred feet high with jagged masses of rock towering above us for another two or three hundred feet, we have a scene of superb grandeur, and after a walk of about a mile find ourselves by Castle rock, and at the entrance of the famous Valley of Rocks.

Days and weeks fly quickly by in exploring the beauties of this romantic little spot. Lee Bay and Woody Bay are within easy distance and their delightful glens, coombes and rushing streams, beyond which it the steep gorge of Heddons Mouth, while coach rides to Ilfracombe, boat trips to Clovelly, and the toy railway to Barnstaple give us the opportunity of familiarizing ourselves with beauties of which all Englishmen should be proud.

CENTENARY OF TENNYSON

BORN AUGUST 6, 1809.

A most picturesque figure is that of Alfred Tennyson, so impressive and yet so human, poet and child, recluse but also interpreter of the spirit of his age. Of that notable body of men born in the year 1809—year "goodly nurse of heroes"—no life-story makes better reading than that of the great English poet.

Tennyson was born at Somersby, Lincolnshire, August 6, 1809. His father, a rector, known as the "stern Doctor," was a man of great stature and strength, the mother was gentle and sympathetic, confident of her children, lending listening ear to the poetic efforts of her boys. She is picture in the following:

"Locks not wide-spread
Madonna-wise on either side her head;
Sweet lips wherein perpetually did reign
The summer calm of golden charity."

When Tennyson was seven years old he was sent to school at the market town of Louth, and this town should be mentioned as the place where his first published work appeared, 1827, Alfred and his brother Charles putting forth "Poems of Two Brothers." For this volume they received $100, but had to take one-half out in books from the publisher's shop. In 1828 the two brothers entered Trinity College, Cambridge. Our poet did not take a degree at Cambridge, early in 1831, called home by the serious illness of his father, who died shortly after his arrival.

At Cambridge was begun the friendship with brilliant loveable Arthur Hallam, whose life and death were to exert such influence on the poet's work. After Alfred left the university, Hallam became a frequent visitor at the Tennysons,' became engaged to his friend's sister Emily, the bond uniting the two men growing stronger and stronger, when suddenly snapped by Hallam's death in 1833 while traveling abroad with his father. His body was brought back home for burial, was laid to rest at Cliveden by the sea.

"When on my bed the moonlight falls,
I know that in thy place of rest
By that broad water of the west
There comes a glory on the walls."

Tennyson, overpowered with loss and grief, his mind filled with memories of his comrade, wrote many verses in response to that influence; but it was years before was printed the connected and complete "In Memoriam," "probably the noblest monument ever raised by the human spirit to the memory of a lost and unforgotten friend."

It was late in 1832, after a Rhine tour taken with Hallam, that there appeared the volume "Poems by Alfred Tennyson;" included in this early output a number of poems now familiar to English speaking people the wide world over—The Lady of Shalott, The Miller's Daughter, The Palace of Art, The Lotos Eaters, A Dream of Fair Women. Very Tennysonian, Benson calls the pictorial poems, a class of poems practically invented by Tennyson. In 1842 he published two volumes, some selections from old poems and among the new work "Morte d'Arthur," "Love and Duty," "Locksley Hall," "Break, Break, Break;" and now, as Benson says, Tennyson came home to the heart of the nation. In 1850 "In Memoriam" was published.

Tennyson did not marry until he was 40. He met Emily Sellwood 20 years previous to their marriage, his brother Charles married her sister in 1836, and a few years later he and Emily became lovers, but they were not wedded until 1850.

At Chapel House, Twickenham, the poet lived the first years after his marriage, and here his son Hallam was born, here he wrote his great ode on the death of Duke of Wellington. In 1853 he moved to the Isle of Wight, at Freshwater in the house called Farringford, took up residence, two years later bought the place, with the proceeds from "Maud," published in 1855. Picturesque, beautiful Farringford was his home for almost 40 years, here he wrote and studied, indulged in the simple pursuits dear to his soul, tramped long miles over down and along shore. To Farringford came visitors from far and near to pay homage to the famous poet.

In 1850, on Wordsworth's death, Tennyson was offered the poet-laureateship, largely owing to Prince Albert's high regard for "In Memoriam." The prince and poet became great friends. On the death of the prince consort in 1861, Tennyson wrote the dedication of the "Idyls," a sincere tribute which won the heart of Queen Victoria, with whom a warm friendship now sprang up. In 1859 the "Idyls of the King" had been published. Though vitally interested in the affairs of his day, the past had strong attractions for Tennyson: he intended to make his chief work the Arthurian legend; and the tales of mystic Round Table, of medieval knight and lady, of tournament and joust, added greatly to his fame and popularity. In 1864 appeared "Enoch Arden," probably the most popular of his works, though it must not be forgotten how "The Charge of the Light Brigade" was able to "quicken the pulse of the working and fighting world."

Twice he was offered a baronetcy, which he refused both times. In 1884 Gladstone offered him a peerage, and again he hesitated about taking a title, preferring his own simple name, but accepted for the sake of his son.

At the age of 70 he put forth a volume of Poems and Ballads, his later work not comparable with the the earlier. Pessimism and and distrust marks his attitude now, this attitude at its climax in "Locksley Hall Sixty Years After," published when Tennyson was at the age of 77. The dramas of the later years met with praise from historians, though not from the average reader. But in the poem written at the age of 80, he came into his own again, at the close of his days, producing "Crossing the Bar," admirably fitted to round out his work, most appropriate for last leaf of his poems.

At 82 he was still wonderfully vigorous, lived but a few months beyond his eighty-third birthday. His illness was brief and painless. Early in 1892 there was a pleasant voyage with his eldest brother, a sojourn in the Isle of Wight, and then weakness caused his retirement to Aldworth. He died there October 6, going out quietly, consciously, calmly saying farewell to the family gathered about him in the radiant moonlight streaming in at the window, sure that

"For tho' from out our bourne of Time and Place.
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face,
When I have crossed the bar."

They buried him in Westminster Abby, in the Poets' Corner, next to Browning and near the Chaucer monument. On Beacon Hill, near his old home Farringford, stands a monument to his memory. KATHERINE POPE.

Mr. Rawson's mule had strayed away, and Pomp had been sent to find it. Instead of running along the road in which direction it had been last seen, Pomp scrambled up Prospect Hill as fast as he could go, and surveyed the countryside.

When he returned in triumph with the mule an hour later, Mr. Rawson inquired why he had wasted time climbing the hill.

"'Twa'n' no waste ob time!" said Pomp, indignantly. "Don't you know, Mr. Rawson, sah, dat a mewel is one ob dose animals you is got t' 'proach from de front end foh yo' own safety? An' how could I 'proach dat mewel from de front end till I knowed whar he was?"—Youth's Companion.

GEORGE L. MICHAELS.
District No. 4, July 27, 1909.

I take this method of informing my friends and the Republican voters that I am a candidate for the House of Delegates, subject to the decision of the Republican nominating convention. If nominated and elected I shall endeavor to faithfully and honestly serve the people to the best of my ability.

W. H. JACOBS.
District No. 11, July 28, 1909.

FOR COUNTY COMMISSIONER.

I hereby announce myself a candidate for the nomination for County Commissioner, subject to the decision of the Republican convention, and earnestly solicit the support of my friends throughout the county.

W. M. LOWDERMILK.
Selbysport, July 12, 1909.

I hereby make formal announcement of my candidacy for the nomination for County Commissioner, subject to the decision of the Republican Nominating Convention, and solicit the support of all my friends.

D. M. DIXON.
Oakland, Md., July 29, 1909.

ARE DEMOCRATS BOUND TO SUPPORT THE DISFRANCHISEMENT AMENDMENT?

The late Judge Charles E. Phelps, in his charge to the Baltimore Grand Jury, delivered Sept. 12th, 1905, said:

"A proposed change in the organic law of a State radically affecting the practical exercise of the elective franchise is obviously a change of vital importance, entirely outside the range of ordinary partisan politics."

In this opinion he is seconded by the late Senator William Pinckney Whyte, who in expressing his opposition to the attempt made under the guise of the Poe amendment to disfranchise fifty thousand foreign born white voters, declared as follows:

"The organic law of a State is supposed to be made by the people themselves, and not by Legislative Assembly, and especially in regard to that part of the Constitution relating to the elective franchise. The vote of the citizen upon this amendment should be guided by his own conscience and not by the dictates of any one."

Another, and even more significant endorsement of Judge Phelps opinion may be found in the position of United State Senator Isidor Rayner who, in a letter dated October 17th, 1905, addressed to the Democrats of Maryland, declared his unqualified opposition to the Poe amendment, although that measure was adopted by a Democratic Legislature, which, at the same time sent Mr. Rayner to the United States Senate, endorsed by a Democratic convention and advocated by the "Organization" with as much, if not more zeal than is now being accorded to the Straus amendment. Senator Rayner, at that time, justified his opposition to the measure in question in the following language, which applies with equal force to the one now under consideration:

"It will, if adopted, perpetuate them (The Democratic Machine) in power and convert the free institutions of the State, not into an oligarchy, because an oligarchy they have never been—but into an autocracy—that does not know what public opinion is and does not care; that never comes in contact with the people, that would pay not the slightest attention or regard their wishes or petitions, and that would wield with the same unlimited power and dominion within the party as has ever been wielded by the most absolute despotism that ever trampled upon the liberties of the human race."

But the strongest of all reasons why the "Straus amendment" should not be deemed a "party measure" which demands the support of all Democrats, regardless of the indiyidual views is to be found in the record of the Democratic party itself, as expressed in its various platforms. It is, in fact distinctly pledged not to attempt the wholesale disfranchisement of the negroes. At its convention in 1899 when John Walter Smith was nominated for Governor the platform upon which it regained control of the State, contained the following promise:

"We distinctly pledge ourselves to do equal and exact justice to all without regard to race, and to guarantee to the colored people of the State the fullest protection in all their rights." In the following year, 1900, their State Convention, adopted the following planks:

"We declare that all governments instituted among men derive their just power from the consent of the governed."

"That any government not based upon the consent of the governed is tyranny."

Again in 1903, but one year before they tried to jam the Poe amendment down the throats of the people, the Democratic party declared in its platform that:

"We disclaim any purpose to do any injustice whatever to our colored population."

In 1904, although they had pushed the Poe amendment through the General Assembly, but a few weeks before the the State Convention met they were noticeably silent upon the subject of the negro voter. But the National Convention, held at St. Louis on July 8th of that year, supplied the deficiency by adopting the following as part of its platform:

"To revive the dead and hateful race and sectional animosities in any part of our common country, mean confusion, distraction of business, and the reopening of wounds now happily healed."

Again in their National platform for the campaign of 1908, is to be found the following declaration:

"The Democratic party is the champion of equal rights and opportunities to all."

It may be noted in this connection that this beneficent declaration does not appiy solely to those whose grandfathers voted prior to 1869, but to all alike. These declarations and promises, if they mean anything at all, prove conclusively that the Democratic party both State and National, has not committed itself to the support of the Straus amendment, although the "bosses" of that organization have done so. Upon the contrary they have in the clearest possible language, repeatedly disavowed any intention of doing what the "Machine" is now endeavoring surreptitiously to accomplish. No Democrat is therefore, obliged to vote for the measure merely because he is a Democrat.

What every voter should do before he makes up his mind in regard to this amendment is again clearly defined by the late Judge Phelps, in the same document above referred to. He said:

"A proposition of that nature is to be scrutinized with jealous care from the standpoint of its reasonable probable effect upon the freedom and purity of future elections and under the seachlight of our past experiences."

The first step to be taken in "scrutinizing with jealous care from the standpoint of its reasonably probable effect upon the purity of our future elections" such a proposition as that framed by the Attorney General and endorsed by his fellow members of the "Organization," is to carefully consider the motiyes of those who caused it to be drawn and submitted to the people. That purpose is now as it was in 1905, to intrench the "organization" in power. Such a bold scheme should be vigorously opposed by all who are interested in the future of our State.

CROTHERS' CLAIMS FOR HIS PARTY

It is natural that a governor who is first and foremost a practical politician should be seeking in this legislative election year to make a plea for the life of the organization which he represents. But in a stump speech made through a newspaper which he considers his organ, Governor Crothers ignores certain facts which the thinking element of the people will be likely to remember. He used the sophisticated argument that with a legislature divided between the two parties—that is, with the House Republican and the Senate Democratic—it would be difficult and in some cases impossible to secure desirable legislation. It is astonishing that the Governor has the nerve to make such a plea with the recorded doings of the two past sessions of Democratic legislatures before him. One might think that he had forgotten the lump-sum expenses fund voted in advance by the last two Democratic legislatures and the padded-payroll scheme connected therewith, says the Baltimore American.

But he remarks further on that his commission on legislative expenses "has filed a unanimous report of definite suggestions, which will unquestionably correct extravagance in legislative expenses." The legislature of 1908 had all the definite suggestions which were necessary. The retiring governor, Edwin Warfield, in his message at the opening of the session, showed through just what channels the legislative wastage was flowing, and showed also just what reforms in legislative methods should be inaugurated. But did the Democratic majorities in the two branches of the legislature pay any attention to the retiring governor's recommendations? On the contrary, these reform suggestions were treated with worse than contemptuous indifference.

The Governor announces that he is in favor of a state utilities board, but it is easy to be comprehended that such a commission, appionted by a partisan governor, might, and probably would be but an instrument to serve, not the people but a political machine. He takes a vast amount of credit, which is not yet due, from having proposed the State Road Law. To claim credit for this scheme at this stage is counting the chicks before they are out of the shell. It yet remains to be demonstrated whether, as the plans will be carried to to realization, the road-building scheme will be a credit to the Crothers administratisn or not. He demonstrated that he is of the machine and with the machine is making a plea for the adoption of the constitutional amendment.

The Governor's stump speech is not in any way an impressive document. Its partisan intent is quite apparent. He repeats several times that he is anxious for the election of a Democratic legislature, and nobody doubts that he is. But when he suggests "greater possibilities" for the state and the city as a result of one more Democratic legislature, the suggestion sounds altogether like the plea of Brer Fox to Brer Rooster to come down and be friendly.

WILL THE EX-GOVERNOR STAY TO THE FINISH.

Ex-Governor Warfield's attack on the Democratic organization should have been made a year ago last fall, when it might have accomplished something.

The leopard has not changed many of its spots. The machine is much now as it was two years ago, when Mr. Warfield took the stump and gave it a clean bill of health. If anything—thanks to wholesome fear of the independent vote, all of which did not follow Mr. Warfield's lead—the organization is better today than it was then. The candidacy of George R. Gaither on a progressive platform presented an opportunity to make effective protest against boss rule. Mr. Warfield was among those who, like the lady in the ballad, preferred to ride with the tiger, and met the usual fate of the victim of misplaced confidence.

It would not be surprising if John Walter Smith gave generously of his superabundant means to the local Democratic machine in order to "accelerate public opinion," as Hon. Lemuel E. Quigg calls it; but harking back to that memorable race for the United States Senate, everybody but Mr. Warfield knew that the cards were stacked against him from the start. He never had a ghost of a show. The organization used him to pull its own chestnuts out of the fire and then tossed him aside.

It is an old, old story that would not seem worth retelling, if repetition is merely to air a grievance. But if the ex-Governor has entered the arena prepared to stay and help fight the battle of good government—within party lines when that course promises results and without party lines when the cause demands that much more difficult plan of campaign—his accessi n to the ranks of independents from principle is a welcome one.—Baltimore News.

Mr. B. W. Wright, a former resident of Oakland, who spent the week here on business, learned this morning that his brother, Capt T. H. Wright, of Cambridge, Md., had been drowned in the Bay off Wolf Trap, Va., while bring his vessel up the Bay to Baltimore from Hampton, Va.

Dr. F. H. Ravenscroft.

In loving remembrance of our dear son who died Aug. 12, 1901, eight years ago, at Friendsville, Maryland:

He is sleeping in the graveyard—
He is lying 'neath the sod,
And his parents hearts are lonely;
Yet they feel he is gone to God.

We will soon pass on to meet him
And make whole the broken band—
Meet him just across the river
In that happy spirit-land.

Where his arms are extended
To embrace us, one by one,
When our work below is ended
And our earthly course is run.

A Good Man Gone to His Reward.

On the 5th day of July, at his home near Deer Park, Andrew Pysell fell asleep, aged 79 years, 9 months and 11 days. Mr. Pysell was born and brought up near Edie, Somerset county, Pa. Soon after his marriage to a Miss Hay, he moved to Garrett county. From this union there survives one daughter, Miss Sarah, who lives on the home place near Deer Park. After the death of his first wife, he married a Miss Bowser who survives him together with three daughters and one son, namely, Mrs. Charles Day, of near Deer Park; Mrs. George Fitzwater and Mrs. Parley Diehl, both of Deer Park, and Charlie Pysell, of near Deer Park.

We have known Mr. Pysell for about fifty-five years. He was a man noted for piety. He was brought up in the Lutheran faith, but after moving to Flatwoods, Md., where there was no Lutheran church convenient, he united with the U. B. church near his home, in which church he was a class leader and often took the place of a clergyman on funeral occasions. He was a carpenter by trade, but paid more attention to farming. He was thoroughly honest, a constant reader of his bible, and consequently had a large fund of Scripture knowledge; a helpful neighbor, a true friend and a peace-loving and conscientious citizen.

He suffered much the last few years of his life. For some time death seems to have toyed with him, but finally he heard the "well done" of his Master, and has gone to rest. He was a good husband and an indulgent father. His family and neighbors laid him to rest in the Flatwoods cemetery on July 7th. The funeral discourse was delivered by the pastor of St. Mark's Lutheran church, Oakland, in the U. B. church a few miles from the place of burial.

Wheat a Successful Crop in the Mountains.

Grain harvesting is now fully on in Garrett county. Not until late years was it believed that wheat could be successfully produced in the mountain regions, but it is now known, as many bushels to the acre can be produced here or more than in the old eastern counties, where the lands have become worn.

The Jennings Brothers, who are running an immense lumber plant in the Grantsville region, are the owners of immense tracts of land once owned by the Cunningham family, the last of whom is a resident of Oakland. Some time in the past year when the lumber business became slack, this wealthy company, rather than lay off their men, put a number of them at work clearing some of these timber lands. One field of seventy-five acres is now being reaped and harvested by a score of men. The grain was of fine growth, but could not be harvested by machinery on account of the many tree stumps, so the old fashioned grain cradle, rake and hand binding had to be restored to, but there were plenty of men yet acquainted with the lost arts of old time harvesting. A pleasant sight this to some at least.

ONCE A FARMER

Mr. Frank P. Rutter, of the Bureau of Statistic of the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., is spending his vacation at Uplands Cottage, Deer Park. This is Mr. Rutter's first visit to Garrett county, and he is very much pleased with the climate and general conditions. Mr. Rutter is accompanied by Mrs. Rutter and two children. Mr. and Mrs. Rutter for the past two years have resided abroad.

Carl Brown, the local base ballist who has had a varied career as a twirler for Grafton, Cumberland and later the Somerset clubs, returned to his home in Oakland last Saturday thoroughly disgusted with semi-professional ball. At Grafton he got "the can" for being too good a player and then went to Cumberland where the club "busted" owing him two weeks' salary. From Cumberland Browne went to Somerset where a like fate awaited him, hence his disgust.

Major J. G. Pangborn, special representative of the B. and O. R. R. Co., spent several days at Mountain Lake Park early in the week. The Major came up from Baltimore on Saturday to act as one of the judges in the oratorical contest at the Park Monday night, and he was so well pleased with Mountain Lake Park that he remained over another day in the mountains. Major Pangborn is one of the best informed men in the county on the subject of railroad construction. He was in Russia as the guest of the Czar on the occasion of the opening of the Siberian Railroad; rode over the entire length of road, and was entertained by the Russian official during his stay in that country. As to Mountain Lake Park and Garrett county generally, he declares it has a great future.

Rev. J. B. Shoup, of Bittinger, accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. Virginia Clay Morgan, of High Point, N. C., and her little daughter, arrived in Oakland last Friday afternoon and the same night Mr. Shoup left for Dayton, Ohio, his native city, where he will be the guest of his brother for a week or two, after which he will journey on to Salt Lake City, Utah, to attend the annual encampment of the Grand Army which assembles there the latter part of this month. Mr. Shoup is just recuperating from a serious illness but he retains the vim that carried him through many a campaign during the years of the sixties. Mrs. Morgan will be the guest of Mrs. Elizabeth Hinebaugh, for a day or two and then she expects to return to her southern home. Mr. Shoup, upon returning from Salt Lake will visit relatives in Kansas, Missouri and Ohio and expects to reach home sometime during the month of September.

Eye "Doctor" Arrested.

"Dr." J. A. Thorn, who widely advertised himself as an eye specialist and has been in Somerset periodically during the past two or three years, was arrested and given a hearing before Justice of the Peace Josiah H. Pisel, at Somerset, on a charge of practicing medicine without a certificate of qualification.

The prosecution was represented by District Attorney John S. Miller, and it was alleged that in treating the eye "Dr." Thorn prescribed medicine with specified directions, although he is not a registered physician. "Dr." Thorn was represented by Attorney L. C. Colborn and contented that while he was not an oculist or registered physician, he is an optician and had merely given his clients proprietary medicines, long known to the medical profession, as well as the public, which any one can purchase at any drug store.

The "Doctor" was held under $100 bail for court and an interesting trial is anticipated.—Meyersdale Republican.

STATE'S LOSS BY DISEASE.

Dr. M. L. Price Says It Amounts to $50,000,000 Annually.

The rather startling statement that Maryland is annually losing more than $50,000,000 because of the peoples' neglect of methods for preventing the spread of infectious and contagious diseases was made yesterday by Dr. Marshall L. Price, secretary of the State Board of Health, who has just finished the compilation of figures on this subject.

"The State," said Dr. Price, "is staggering under a burden due to preventable sickness, of which the average citizen has no conception, because he has always experienced it. It has hardly occurred to him that a large share of the sickness in his family could be prevented if the proper measures were taken, and with but small expense. Typhoid could be stamped out of Maryland for $15,000 annually.

"The economic loss of the State from tuberculosis is estimated at $24,404,810 annually. The annual loss due to typhoid fever is never less than $5,000,000. It is safe to say that the annual loss from all preventable diseases in Maryland exceeds $50,000,000.

"The experience of Cuba, Mexico and Panama with yellow fever has shown that a disease which has been constantly present for more than three centuries can be eliminated entirely at a small expense.

"In order to control infectious diseases four things are necessary: First, prompt registration of the cases with the local authorities; second, the co-operation of the patient and his family; third, the co-operation of the medical profession, and, fourth, the co-operation of the general public.

"The State Board of Health has completed one of the most comprehensive systems of information regarding infectious diseases in use in any sanitary jurisdiction in America. Returns are made monthly to this board from 41 sanitary jurisdictions, among which are 18 cities and towns and 23 counties. Though these returns are as yet incomplete, the progress of epidemics can be traced almost as accurately as the corn and wheat crops can be predicted by the expert statisticians of the Govern ment.

"The influenza epidemic of the beginning of 1908 and the later epidemic of measles were predicted some months in advance of their outbreak. Accurate records are kept of intestinal diseases on the watersheds, especially of typhoid fever, and town health officers are given early information, which enables them to protect their watersheds before the onset of an epidemic.

"The present tendency in the control of all the infectious diseases is to make the bedside of the patient the point of attack for all preventive measures. This involves the co-operation of the attending physician and the placing upon him jointly with the local and State authorities of a considerable share of responsibility. This responsibility should be fixed by law and adequate compensation allowed the physician by the State for these invaluable services. The spread of practically all infectious diseases can be easily arrested by the proper hygienic measures applied at the bedside of the patient. This is particularly the case with typhoid fever. If all typhoid bacilli were detroyed at the time they were discharged from the patient, typhoid fever would disappear in less than one year. The means necessary to effect this are: First, the furnishing of packages by the State containing disinfectants, the necessary vessels, napkins, etc., to receive the diseased secretions and excretion previous to their destruction; second, report blanks to be returned by the physician giving the proper means of prevention to be furnished by the health authorities of the State and to be indorsed by the local authorities; third, a fee fixed by law for completing and reporting upon the preventive procedures formulated by the State.

"The essentials of this method were devised in Maryland for the control of tuberculosis, and have since been adopted by New York and several other States. They could be applied as easily to the other infectious diseases. It is probable that the cost of eliminating typhoid fever from Maryland under this system would not exceed $15,000 per annum. The same system is applicable to whooping cough, diphtheria, measles, scarlet fever, influenza and infectious pneumonia, as well as tuberculosis and typhoid fever.

"The common infectious diseases of this climate are naturally more difficult to control, but they may all be eliminated or reduced to a negligible figure for a trivial expenditure."

An All-Day Meeting at North Glade.

Under the auspices of the North Glade Sunday school, a children's day service will be held on Sunday, 8th inst., beginning at 10 a. m. A splendid program is being prepared. Prominent speakers from Oakland and other places will be given the right of way in the afternoon. Excellent music will be furnished for the occasion. All are cordially invited, with a special invitation to ye editor. Every one is requested to bring his lunch basket and in every way help make this meeting both enjoyable and profitable. GEO. W. MOON, Supt.

Automobiles Plentiful.

Yesterday morning about eleven o'clock fourteen automobiles were lined up along the curb on Second street on the block bounded by Green and Alder streets. The owners of the machines were from several states, including, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Maryland, while three or four were owned by local people.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man arrested by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda, through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.—He entered the cabin and discovered the English woman and her maid.

CHAPTER VIII. — Stephens quickly learned the wrong vessel had been captured, Lord Darlington's private yacht, the lord's wife and maid being aboard. He explained the situation to her ladyship.

CHAPTER IX.—Then First Mate Tuttle laid bare the plot, saying that the Sea Queen had been taken in order to go to the Antarctic circle.

CHAPTER X.—Tuttle explained that on a former voyage he had learned that the Donna Isabel was lost in 1753. He had found it frozen in a huge case of ice on an island and contained much gold.

CHAPTER XI.—Stephens, however, consented to be captain of the expedition. He told Lady Darlington. She was greatly alarmed, but expressed confidence in him.

CHAPTER XII.—The Sea Queen encountered a vessel in the fog. Stephens attempted to communicate, which caused a fierce struggle and he was overcome. Tuttle finally squaring the situation. Then the Sea Queen headed south again.

CHAPTER XIII.—Under Tuttle's guidance the vessel made progress toward its goal.

CHAPTER XIV.—De Nova, the mate, told Stephens that he believed Tuttle, now acting as skipper, insane because of his queer actions.

CHAPTER XV.—Stephens was awakened by crashing of glass. He saw Tuttle in the grip of a spasm of religious mania and overcame him. The sailor upon regaining his senses was taken aft.

CHAPTER XVI.—Tuttle committed suicide by shooting. Upon vote of the crew Stephens assumed the leadership and the men decided to continue the treasure hunt, the islands being supposed to be only 200 miles distant.

CHAPTER XVII.—Tuttle was buried in the sea, Lady Darlington pronouncing the service. Stephens awaking from sleep saw the ghost, supposed to have formed the basis for Tuttle's religious mania.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Upon advice of Lady Darlington, Stephens started to probe the ghost. He came upon Lieut. Sanchez, the drunken officer he had humiliated in Chile. He found that at Sanchez' inspiration, Engineer McKnight played "ghost" to scare the men into giving up the quest.

CHAPTER XIX.—Stephens announced that the Sea Queen was at the spot where Tuttle's quest was supposed to be. The crew was anxious to go on in further search. De Nova and Stephens conquered them in a fist fight. Lady Darlington thanked him.

CHAPTER XX.—The Sea Queen started northward. She was wrecked in a fog. Stephens, De Nova, Lady Darlington and her maid being among those to set out in a life boat.

CHAPTER XXI.—Ten were rescued. Stephens saw only one chance in a thousand for life. Lady Darlington confessed her love to Stephens and he did likewise.

CHAPTER XXII.—Lady Darlington told her life story; how she had been bartered for a title, her yearning for absent love. She revealed herself as the school chum of Stephens' sister. She expressed a wish to die in the sea rather than face her former friends and go back to the old life. A ship was sighted.

CHAPTER XXIII.—The craft proved to be a derelict. They boarded her. She was frozen tight with hundreds of years of ice. Stephens found frozen bodies.

CHAPTER XXIV.—They accomplished the grewsome task of cleaning the cabin of the frozen bodies and rendering it fit for habitation. The vessel was the Donna Isabel, lost in 1753, 126 years previous.

CHAPTER XXV.—They read the log of the Isabel, which told how the Spaniards had died from cold, one by one. Lady Darlington sang to prevent the men from becoming moody.

ing forth from under an anaesthetic, leaving me weak as a child, yet with brain and faculties aroused to action. Johnson thrust forward the cleaver.

"Let me get in there, sir; I'm the man for a cuttin' job."

I stepped aside, and the broad blade fell slashing against the front of the ice.

"Only two of you men can work here at once," I put in hastily. "Hold on, Johnson, until we get this shipshape. An axman, with a helper to haul back the ice out of the way, is all we need. Any more would only be in the way; besides, some of us ought to be on deck. It is going to require hours, maybe days, to get that chest out, and meanwhile we must sail this vessel and keep her right side up. The thing to do is to arrange relays, and keep at it steady. Johnson, you and Kelly go to work first. The rest of us will climb up into the cabin, and figure it out."

They went along with me up the ladder as though they were prisoners, casting the last lingering glances below, where the weird flame of the candle flickered yellow, the blows of the cleaver echoing sharply as they clustered about the stove, welcoming the warmth of it. It had been frigid below decks, although we had been scarcely conscious of it in our excitement. But now we stood shivering, gazing into each others' faces and actually afraid to talk lest the whole occurrence should prove a dream from which a chance word might awaken us. Three million pesos—here, actually here; almost within reach of our hands; they were digging for them just below; even then, in the silence, we could hear the faint echo of blows being struck against the ice. Three million pesos!—and it was all ours, our very own—to divide, to spend, to do with exactly as we pleased. We had dreamed about all this before, on the decks of the ill-fated Sea Queen, but now we sought to grasp it as an actual existing fact, and our minds seemed paralyzed by the knowledge. I even forgot that Doris was present until she touched me gently on the shoulder, and I looked down into her questioning eyes.

"Do you not know what we have just discovered below?" I asked, still tingling to the marvel of it. "The treasure, the Spanish treasure!"

"Oh, yes," but the soft voice seemed tinged with sadness. "Yet it does not greatly interest me. Money seems so little here, so utterly valueless."

The simple words, the tone of their utterance brought me to myself as though I had received an electric shock. She was still smiling, yet all at once I noticed how white her face was, how dark the shadows beneath her eyes. The lure of the gold vanished from my mind, as if some wizard's wand had waved it away. I thought of the treacherous sea without, the life and death struggle before us, those dreary leagues separating us from hope. My hands clasped hers, the expression of love in my eyes brightening her face instantly.

"That is so much better, Jack," she said tenderly. "I knew it was only the madness of a moment which caused you to forget. Come out on deck with me until you lose all memory of it—until I bring you back to real life again."

"I do not need it, sweetheart," and I bent low, looking into her eyes. "The fever has left my blood. I hardly know how it ever laid such hold upon me, but the thought of all that wealth below drove me as mad as the others. You see how much I need you."

"Oh, no; you would have recovered without my help, although it might have required more time to complete a cure. But I fear there is no hope for the men."

"I certainly shall not spare you to minister to them."

She laughed, her happiness of disposition returning.

"That would be useless; they are of different stamp. The fever for sudden wealth is in the blood of all of us. See how excited Celeste is. Perhaps if I had ever experienced poverty I might be crazed also. But it is so foolish here—here," and she swept her hands about in comprehensive gesture, "when we know it can be ours only for a day, or at most a week."

"But we have not given up hope," I protested. "Why should we? The Donna Isabel seems stanch beneath us."

"Even in case of that miracle I want nothing to do with this treasure," she said gravely. "It seems to me, Jack, there must be a curse upon that gold below. It will never do good to any human being. It was stolen by the sword, won for Spain by the shedding of blood, and has since cursed this ship and all who sailed in her. The living and the dead guarded it, and now we have come into its evil clutch. It is not superstition but faith which makes me say this—the Donna Isabel will never make port; that gold below will never do a soul on board anything but harm. I wish it could be left where it is, buried in the ice."

"At such a suggestion the men would mutiny."

"I suppose so," she acknowledged sadly, "and the end will be the same in either case. But I want you to be different. Let them build their air castles; but do you come out on deck with me, where the sea and sky will give us other thoughts."

Comprehending only vaguely what she meant, yet beneath the witching spell of her presence I went gladly enough, forgetting utterly that useless treasure imbedded in the ice below.

CHAPTER XXVII.

In Which the Treasure Causes Trouble

But the men did not forget, or cease in their eager efforts to rescue that frozen gold from the grasp of the ice. By this time, thoroughly convinced myself that our final preservation of this wealth would prove impossible, I was still far from devoid of interest in its recovery, and consequently made no effort to interrupt the work being carried on between decks. It was better that the men be busy and their minds occupied than to have them roaming aimlessly about the decks in discontent, now that the ship and weather gave us little occasion for concern. Here they vigorously plied the cleaver, working in relays of two hours each, during the remainder of the day and night. After breakfast had been served we all of us went below to unite our strength in hauling forth the loosened box from the ice cavity.

We accomplished this by resorting to block and tackle, and even then experienced no small difficulty in dragging it away from the ice grip. Under the dim candlelight it appeared a fair-sized sea-chest, constructed of some heavy, dark wood, and bound securely by metal bands, with a cumbersome lock. A considerable quantity of water from somewhere continued to seep down into the lazarette, making the floor an icy puddle, and so we tailed on to the ropes again, and hoisted the chest up through the trap-door out upon the cabin deck. I could find no keys in any of the state-rooms, and we must have been half an hour breaking the rusty lock and prying open the lid, the only sounds audible the blows struck and the heavy breathing of the men. Finally we wrenched apart the last band, and our eager eyes beheld the revealed contents—pieces-of-eight, yellow and level to the top! There was a wild yell, a fierce scramble, the crazed men digging their fingers into the coins, handling them, fondling them, laughing and crying like children in their excitement, and cursing each other as they struggled for a chance at the box. For the moment, staring down at the dull glow of the metal, I even lost control of myself, scarcely aware of the mad uproar. It was actually there—there before me! That old Spanish record had all been true; here, and beneath that ice between decks lay the remainder—three million pesos! Here was the wealth of a king; here, almost within reach of our hands, and it was all ours—ours, if we could only bring it forth to where it possessed value.

If we only could! The thought struck me like a blow. I knew the truth, the truth. There was not one chance in a thousand—not one. I made no effort to deceive myself. The men, even the mate, blinded by the gold-lust had ignored facts plain as day to me—the terrible listing of the ship to port, the constant seeping of water into the hold, the increasing soddenness of the staggering hull—all these combined to tell the story—that the Donna Isabel was doomed. No power of men, situated as we were, could ever save her. The protecting ice-sheath, by help of which she had drifted ghost-like out of the Antarctic, pounded by the fierce seas, loosened by the milder air of more northern latitudes, had already commenced to flake off, and the invading water was discovering crevices everywhere along her ancient seams. We had come to the gold; we had discovered it; it was ours. But we could only gaze on it, and give it back to the ocean in exchange for our lives. I straightened up, my lips compressed, and looked beyond the struggling figures of the men into Doris' questioning gray eyes. Father of Mercy, I possessed something worth more than money—the love of a woman! Ay, but what of the men? What of the men? It would be cutting their hearts out; yet it must be done—done, if necessary, with all the brutality of a slave driver. She had said this treasure was a curse, a legacy of crime and death, a prize for dead men. Not while I retained mind and body to battle should it cost our lives. I pushed De Nova backward, and planted myself across the open chest, scowling into the uplifted, angry faces.

"That's enough, men. This is part of the treasure all right, but there is no occasion for you to go crazy over it. Put those coins back—do you hear, McKnight?—put them back, and we'll shut down the lid. They're nice to look at, and dream over, but that's about all the good we'll ever get of them. Were there any signs of others down there in the ice, Johnson?"

"No, sir, but they'll be there."

"Oh, yes, no doubt they'll be there, but the only way we could ever get them out would be to run this hooker ashore in some mild climate and let the ice melt. It's plain enough to see what has happened. The Donna Isabel sailed in ballast, these chests being about the only cargo she carried. They shifted in the heavy seas, and the Lord only knows where they are now. Anyway, they are safe beyond the reach of your ice cleaver."

They stared into each others' faces, the disagreeable truth slowly penetrating their minds. Kelly spoke, his voice trembling:

"Then why the hell, sir, couldn't we do just what you said?"

"What! run her ashore?—simply because, my lad, that shore happens to be a thousand miles away, and I doubt if this wreck keeps afloat three days longer."

Their excited faces told of incredulity, of a suspicion that I was playing with them, and I went on swiftly:

"You fellows have been so crazy the last two days you haven't thought of anything but gold. I tell you it is not the treasure, but our lives we've got to save. The ice is peeling off the sides, and the ship is taking water like a sieve. We are going to be driven back to the long-boat, and how much of this heavy stuff can we transport in her? I know it's mighty tough, lads, but we might as well face things as they are."

I expected opposition, but not such a wild storm of curses and execrations as greeted these words. All sense of sea discipline vanished, even De Nova joining in the outcry. I remained, planted across the box, waiting for the bedlam to cease, uncertain how I had best attempt to restore them to their senses. Cole decided the matter by rushing forward like an enraged bull, throwing me aside with a heave of his shoulder, the next instant burying his hands in the coins. That the fellow was out of his head was evident enough—mad as a March hare—but I could not hesitate because of that. Those others were on the verge; all they needed for open revolt was leadership, example, and I caught up a chair and laid the blubbering negro on the deck, pieces-of-eight flying in every direction as he fell.

"Unless it's a fight you want, stand back, the whole of you!" I threatened, the broken chair still in my hands. "We may be able to take this chest, or a part of it, with us, but there is going to be no more digging done down below. De Nova who are you with in this row—the men or me?"

"By gar, it makes me mad to give up all zat monies."

"Well, get mad! you'll have to give it up just the same. Don't be a fool, man. You can see this for yourself; you're a sailor; it would require a year to tunnel through that ice with the tools we've got, and look at the hull under us. Why, you can see the list of the deck even here in the cabin, and the feel of her when she drops into a hollow is enough to make a seaman sick. Which is worth most, mate, those yellow boys or the little girl yonder?"

He looked at Celeste, white-faced, the tears staining her cheeks, her eyes glowing like two coals, and all the fierce passion of resistance seemed to desert his countenance. His glance dropped to the deck, returning to my face.

"By gar, if you put it zat way, monsieur, zen I choose the lady, sure. But ze sing I want is both of 'em."

"No doubt; but you have sense enough to realize that you can't have both. So I count you with me. Now, how about you, Johnson?"

The big, hairy seaman, sober-faced and grave-eyed, glanced about on his mates and straightened up.

"I'm here to obey orders, sir," he

"Unless It's a Fight You Want, Stand Back, the Whole of You!"

said slowly. "I've allers been poor, an' I reckon the Lord don't mean me to ever git rich."

I held out my hand, deeply touched by the sterling honesty of the reply.

"You've got something worth more than money, Bill, and that's manhood. You stand the acid. Shake hands, mate."

He responded awkwardly enough, having received more cuffs than praise during his rough sea life, yet the expression in the mild blue eyes gave me confidence that I had touched the right chord. I surveyed the others—McKnight leaning on the cleaver, red-faced and scowling, Sanchez, Kelly and Dade back of him, the negro still groaning on the deck.

"Dade, come here." The fellow shuffled over toward me, as spineless as a jelly-fish. "Now, Kelly, you and Sanchez lay Cole out in a bunk and dress his head. All he needs is a bandage and plenty of cold water. When you get done with that job come on deck and I'll find you another. McKnight, drop that cleaver and come along with us."

They did not like it; but with De Nova, Johnson and Dade standing behind me, they realized the uselessness of revolt. Their hesitation and growling curses irritated me none the less.

"Jump, you fellows, unless you want the same medicine Cole just took."

The two men lifted the negro in their arms and bore him back to one of the state-rooms aft. Kelly came out again and returned with a pannikin of water. I bent down and closed the lid of the chest. The five of us tramped out on deck.

It was, indeed, a rare day for that season of the year and in that ocean, the sky overhead pale blue and cloudless, the wide sea stirred merely by the gentlest swell, the slight breeze steady, and barely firm enough to hold the rotten canvas stiff. There was even sufficient heat in the sun's rays to moisten the ice along the decks where the chill of the wind did not strike, and the sweep of the horizon extended farther than we had seen for weeks. The beauty of the day would have put new heart and life into all of us but for the miserable wreck underfoot. The very glare of the sunlight seemed to reveal with new vividness how close the end was. Light as the sea ran, the ice-laden bow of the Donna Isabel ploughed deeply under, every crest bursting in white foam through the break in the port bulwarks, the list in the deck so steep we made our way forward with difficulty along the slippery surface. Our rate of progress had become so slow as to leave only the barest ripple in the wake. Clambering over into the fore-chains I pointed out to the men how the sea was encroaching on the bulging side. They stared at the evidence gravely, each comprehending clearly the dread meaning, yet no one spoke for a minute.

"I reckon you was right, sir," admitted Johnson, finally. "The old hooker is goin' down."

De Nova peered along the slippery deck, steaming in the sun, moodily, but said nothing until he looked up and caught my eyes.

"W'at you do, monsieur?"

"I mean to hold on as long as it is safe," I replied, "because the cabin gives shelter to the women. We all know what the open boat means; and we'll put that off until the last possible moment. We are not making much progress, it's true; but still, every mile helps, and, if this weather will only hold, the wreck may keep afloat for several days yet, but we'll get everything fixed for a quick departure."

Kelly and Sanchez appeared in the cabin door, and I called to them to join us.

"Now, lads, let's make use of what daylight we've got left. This weather is likely to change any minute. Three of you lower that jib, and get out the canvas belonging to the long-boat. Piece the jib up with any old stuff you can find that will stand a light wind. De Nova, you take charge of that job. Dade, you'd better run back to the tiller, and hold her steady as the jib comes down. Johnson and I will see that the long-boat is sound, stocked, and ready for launching."

We made a thorough job of it, overhauling the boat from stem to stern, and ending by rigging up block and tackle for hoisting her, when loaded, over the bulwarks. We lashed the Donna Isabel's helm again, and dispatched Dade into the cabin after supplies. The greater portion of the stores brought from the Sea Queen, more especially the canned goods, remained intact, and we packed these away snugly in the stern lockers, adding whatever we could find that remained eatable among the frozen stores in the lazarette. Altogether we thus amassed a sufficient supply. We rolled up all the extra blankets, shoving them under the seats, and saw that serviceable spars and oars were safely stowed and lashed. It was growing dusk before these matters had all been attended to, and I finally stepped out of the boat. The men were massed in a body on the deck, and the moment I saw them I understood they had been discussing the situation. De Nova spoke:

"Monsieur," he questioned, "how much in American money would be in ze chest?"

"I don't know, of course, but just for a guess, perhaps $100,000—maybe more."

"An' zare be only ze ten of us. To divide it up make, maybe, ten t'ousand dollar for each. Was it not so?"

"Why, yes, or even more than that, for I will cheerfully waive my share, and can pledge that Lady Darlington will do the same. But what of it?"

"Zat fine lot monies for sailor-man," he said, eagerly. "An' w'y not have it? Anyhow, w'y not try to save it? Ze long-boat is built to hol' 25 peoples, an' we only ten. Zen w'y not take ze gol'? It eat not'ing, it drink not'ing, an' if it weight too much, zen we t'row it overboard. But w'y not try carry it, ze hundred t'ousand dollar?"

There was no good reason why we shouldn't; besides, the very possibility of preserving even that share of the treasure would prove an inspiration to the men. I looked about into their anxious faces, feeling myself some measure of their excitement.

"That will be all right, lads," I said gladly. "You've earned it fair enough, and we'll start with it anyhow. Take the stuff out of the chest and tie it up in blankets. Then we can stow it away evenly so as to keep the boat balanced. But," I added, as the memory of what Doris had said came to me, "I think it only fair to tell you that I'm sure there is bad luck in every peso of it."

The men gave my croaking prophecy no second thought, but went trotting aft, chattering together like a parcel of boys.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In Which the Donna Isabel Goes Down

The following night and day passed quietly enough, the weather holding clear, but with a mist slowly gathering in the south that seemed to threaten change. I observed just before sunset that this fog had so thickened and spread as to obscure nearly a third of the sky, and yet there was no veering of the wind or noticeable increase in the roll of the sea. The hulk was sinking, yet so slowly that we were only certain of the fact through constant measurements and the sight of water seeping in through the numerous cracks revealed by the disappearing ice. It was a situation to get upon the nerves, yet I do not remember that it occasioned any great change in the routine of our life on board.

The negro Cole acted as though he had lost his mind, entirely, and after studying him awhile I concluded to let him do as he pleased. He ate breakfast with the rest of us, but without speaking, and afterward, when we left the table, picked up the cleaver and made directly for the lazarette. I called to him, but he merely rolled his eyes up at me from the blackness below and disappeared, the icy water slushing underfoot. We soon heard him vigorously slashing away at the ice, muttering constantly to himself. I went part way down the ladder, with a candle in my hand, whence I could see him toiling away at the end of the hole the men had excavated in the ice, though he paid no attention to my call. The water was fully six inches deep over the lazarette deck, splashing back and forth as the vessel rolled, and I could see drops of seawater squeezing in through the sides of her and dripping steadily down. There was nothing to do but leave the fellow alone, so after telling Dade to look down the ladder once in a while and keep an eye on him I joined the others on deck.

Paul's Teachings to Thessalonicans

Sunday School Lesson for August 8, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON SIX.—1 Thes. 5:12-24. Memory verses 16-18.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"See that none render evil for evil unto any man; but ever follow that which is good."—Thes. 5-15.

TIME.—This epistle was written probably in A. D. 51, or early in A. D. [illegible].

PLACE.—At Corinth during Paul's [illegible] and a half work in that city.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

Paul's Letter of Consolation and Wise Advice.—1. Characteristics of the First Epistle to the Thessalonians. Note the facts in "The Lesson in Its Setting." Review the circumstances of the Thessalonian church as given in Acts 17. See lesson 3 of this quarter. Three missionaries had come there from Philippi, two of them torn and bruised by a terrible flagellation at Philippi, emerging from the lowest dungeon of a prison, their whole aspect bespeaking their poverty, their sufferings, their earthly insignificance. These poor persecuted wanderers supported themselves by weaving black goat's hair into tent cloth. Here they preached a few weeks, founded a church, and were driven away by persecution.

2. Paul longed to visit them again, and made three vain attempts to do so, from Berea, from Athens and from Corinth. He felt their need of training and of more knowledge of the truth, of comfort, and of guidance.

3. Timothy had just come back from Thessalonica, and had brought a report concerning the church, giving a favorable report in general. But two facts were made known by him. One was that they were suffering severe persecutions from both Jews and Gentiles; the other that they were discouraged and troubled by the death of some before the second coming of the Lord Jesus.

4. The epistle is very personal and retrospective, breathing a spirit of affection and of joy.

5. If it seems strange that such a letter could be written to a church founded by Paul less than a year before, implying the wonderful maturity of this infant church, when we compare it with the slow progress of modern missions, we must remember that the first church members were Jews and religious proselytes, long trained in the religion of the true God. Moreover, many of the Greeks were cultivated and thoughtful people, who through the Gospel had been enlightened by the Holy Spirit.

A Lesson in Morals for the Building Up of the Noblest Christian Life.—V. 23. First, the ideal and aim. The First sentences of the Lord's Prayer express the ideal of the whole prayer, and, therefore, of all prayer and living. It is as necessary to have a right goal of life as for a sea captain to know the port for which he is sailing.

"And the very God of peace." Better as R. V., the God of peace himself, the God who brings peace—the peace with himself, through sins forgiven, and nature in harmony with his; peace in the soul, peace of conscience, the peace of trust in God our Father. "Sanctify you." Make you holy, pure, free from sin and imperfection, from every taint of evil. "Wholly." Unto completeness, to full perfection, in degree and in kind.

"Whole spirit and soul and body." Every part of your nature, the spirit that allies us to God, the highest moral nature. "And soul."

Second. On our way to this ideal we have first as a means, the right treatment of pastors and teachers (vs. 12, 13). "We beseech you." Because it is so important, and lies within your choice and power "To know them." To understand their feelings and motives and self denials, and their desire to help you, even when they "admonish you." They hate to do it, but if they love you they must do it at times.

"Esteem them very highly in love." The greatest force for building character is to love and esteem good people, such as are worthy to be pastors and teachers. And show your esteem and love in every possible way.

"Be at peace with yourselves." By being so earnest in seeking the object of Christian worship and teaching, that all differences between individuals are of little value compared with the great purpose that binds all in one.

We build character by service for others (v. 14). To this end Paul says, "We exhort." Encourage, summon, inspire by word and example.

"Warn them that are unruly," like disorderly soldiers, breaking from their ranks. Such is the picture presented by the Greek word. Cause the unruly to see the evil and danger of their ways.

"Comfort the feeble-minded." Better as in R. V., encourage the faint-hearted, the discouraged.

"Support the weak." Pay especial attention to them. That is what your strength is for.

While we are not to despise prophesyings we should (v. 21) "prove all things." Apply the right test. Separate the wheat from tares. Distinguish between genuine and counterfeit coins of truth. Then "hold fast that which is good." This is especially needful in our day.

In a word (v. 22) "abstain from every form of evil," R. V., which is the true rendering of "abstain from all appearance of evil."

You can do this, because (v. 24) "faithful is he that calleth you to this life and this work. He will perform his promises.

Marjorie's Inspiration.

By J. W. EVANS.

Copyrighted, 1905, by Associated Literary Press.

Marjorie was little more than fifteen. She called it a little less than sixteen, and, in keeping with that declaration, surreptitiously lengthened her skirts so gradually that her unsuspecting mother never noticed it.

Also she read "His Heart's Queen" with the same circumspect privacy and tortured her tip tilted nose with strenuous massage till she found that her ardor to make it classic merely made it red. In a word, Marjorie was growing up.

Her present grievance as she looked from her window with a face as dismal as the sky was that her sister Rachel was to leave in a few hours to attend a house party in Philadelphia from which she, forsooth, was excluded by reason of her tender years. And that horrid Tom Norris, who had laughed when she said she was near sixteen, was to go with Rachel.

Well, the papers predicted rain, and she hoped it would just pour. It was at that point that her thoughts took a turn by undoubted inspiration, and she suddenly darted downstairs with an expression from which the wrath had partially cleared. She'd show them!

A few hours later she escorted Rachel urbanely to the door. "Goodby, dear," she said sweetly. "Don't forget your umbrella. It's going to rain. You two look just like a bride and groom," she added maliciously as Norris picked up Rachel's suit case. She was pleased to observe that Rachel flushed with annoyance.

"I sent mine by express," said Tom apologetically.

"Pooh! You did it on purpose."

"Marjorie!" said her sister severely. The only response as they departed was a derisive laugh.

"She's a little imp sometimes," said Rachel, "but she's growing up. I suppose I was just as bad."

When they emerged from the subway at Twenty-third street the rain was falling in a fine, businesslike drizzle that had evidently come to stay. "Oh, dear, these ostrich plumes!" wailed Rachel. "I didn't think it would come so soon. No; don't put up the umbrella. The car is right here. It won't be worth the trouble, and you have the suit case."

NORRIS RAISED THE UMBRELLA HURRIEDLY TO PROTECT HER HAT.

A shadow of a smile flickered across his face, which she noted. "I believe you enjoyed her horrid joke," she scolded, shaking her head at him.

The car made its way west with exasperating delays, and at last, within a block of the ferry house, it came to a stop with a sudden jerk of finality. The conductor told the exasperated passengers that the line was blocked somewhere and that those in a hurry had better walk.

"Let's make the best of it," said Rachel. "And blessing on that child for reminding me to bring my umbrella."

When they stepped from the car platform a moment later Norris raised the umbrella hurriedly to protect her hat. A bewildering instant passed before they fully understood what had happened, but they were terribly aware of the roar of delighted laughter that went up from the damp crowd, which turned amused faces on them as if glad of anything cheery on so gloomy a day.

The ground where they stood had the appearance of a sudden snowfall. Every corner and crevice of their clothing was white with a clinging shower that continued to patter to the ground with every move they made.

The rim of Rachel's "Merry Widow" caught a reserve supply that fell in a continual stream whether she looked up or down. The curved brim of Tom's derby made up in depth for what it lacked in area and contributed its mite to the seemingly endless supply. The crowd was in a second paroxysm of delight before the two victims grasped the dreadful truth that it was rice.

"That awful child!" was all Rachel could gasp in her consternation.

Clearly it was a time for action. Tom seized the single suit case, and, with the interested crowd making way for them right and left, they hurried on, a gleeful procession of prospective fellow passengers trailing along in their rice strewn wake.

"Tom," the girl gasped, "it's perfectly horrid! Oh, oh, if only I hadn't come—if only I had that youngster here!"

Still attended by a grinning throng, Tom purchased the tickets, and they made the boat with half a minute to spare. Partly from the unwonted exertions and partly from her feelings Rachel's face was scarlet, seeing which Tom kept his own carefully impassive.

He remained silent as she talked, begging him half tearfully to brush away the grains from her collar. "Oh, and it's down inside my collar too," she cried. Then she saw his eye twinkle, and her color flamed up again.

She congealed into frozen silence. "You're just as horrid as Marjorie," she said at last. "You enjoyed her mean joke about the suit case, and you haven't minded this one bit, and I'm not going to Philadelphia at all. I'm going right back on the next boat."

There were angry tears in her eyes as she finished, but they were quickly repressed when she saw the other eyes still turned on them from all quarters with interested amusement.

"That's better," he said dryly as he observed the change in expression. "We don't want to give them the idea that we are making for a divorce court. It's too soon to be conventional. You aren't supposed to weep for at least a month. Now, then," he went on, calmly unheeding the one withering glance she cast at him when she was sure no one would see it, "if you go back the kid will have the joke on you. You can't do a thing to her, and the more angry you are the better she'll be pleased. Furthermore, my dear girl"—

"I'm not your dear girl," she observed briefly.

"Oh, yes, you are. What I was going to say was that it seems to me you're a little rough on yours truly. I don't especially mind your apparently violent aversion to the idea of being married to me, but I've been intending to tell you for some time that I don't share in it. I think the whole idea is brilliant. I think that kid sister of yours is bright enough to be twenty, and I'm going to apologize for my former insult to her age the next time I see her." He waited impressively for his words to sink in. "Now, just reflect," he went on; "the rice throwing and the unpleasant part of getting married is over and done with. Why not finish it up? Let's do it now—and then there will be a bride and groom at the house party."

She looked at him in wonder.

"There is nothing the matter with your imagination, Tom," she said, her calmness quite restored by the magnificent coolness of his suggestion.

"Of course there isn't," he smiled. "I'm not proposing it for a joke, dear. I love you. And it's practicable because I know the license clerk in Philadelphia, so that there will be no trouble about that."

She began to shake her head, but he noticed that she did not resent the term he had used. "Let me think," she said at last. "I'll tell you when we get there. But Tom—Tom—it would be insane."

"Not a bit of it," he said stoutly. "We'll both live to call your sister blessed."

They relapsed into a silence which he was careful to break as seldom as possible till they were nearing Philadelphia.

"Three minutes to the Broad street station," he said gravely as the train pulled in at West Philadelphia. "Just three minutes in which to decide if we are to avoid our well intentioned friends at the station."

She shook her head. "Oh, no—longer than that," she said as she smiled up at him. "It's taken me nearly three hours."

Out In the Rain.

The Indian fairly revels in rain, declares G. W. James in his book, "What the White Race May Learn From the Indian." Indian women no more mind the rain than they do that the sun should shine or the wind blow, and as for any evil effect from the wet there are no signs of it.

In the first place, they have no fear of the rain. It is not constantly instilled into their minds from childhood that "they mustn't get wet or they'll take cold." This has something to do with it. In the second place, they move about with natural activity in the rain as at other times. This keeps the blood circulating and prevents any lowering of the temperature of the body. In the third place, their general outdoor life gives them such a robustness that if there is any tax upon the system it is fully ready to meet it. Everything in nature loves to be out in the rain, and upon human beings its effects are beneficial, provided they value health and vigor more than they mind a little discomfort in the bedragglement of their clothes.

The Chess Automaton.

Baron Kempelen of Hungary began to astonish the civilized world of Europe about 1769 with his chess automaton. This was apparently a figure controlled by mechanical devices and which was able, notwithstanding the fact that apparently no intelligence was concerned in its movements and decisions, generally to beat its human antagonists. The cabinet connected with the automaton appeared entirely too small to contain a hidden operator. And yet it did conceal a man who was an expert chess player. He was a Polish patriot who had lost both of his legs—perhaps in the recent war over Poland. This man, Woronsky by name, was an expert player. With him hidden in the cabinet and yet really on the spot the rest was easy.

AFFAIR WITH MARRIED WOMAN

An Adventure That Landed Knight of the Road In Jail Along With Runaway Wife of a Connecticut Farmer. Experience In New Jersey.

[Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.]

"IF I should tell you," said the dilapidated gentleman as he got a new brace for his feet and back—"if I should tell you that the tramp now and then falls in love and that his love is returned, you would smile in derision, and yet I should be telling you nothing but the truth. I could go further than that and tell you that there would be many female tramps on the road if the male tramps did not discourage them. I have met with this spirit of adventure and romance in women fifty times over, and sometimes it has caused me considerable trouble.

"You have heard of the tramp being arrested for burglary, robbery, arson, thieving, assault, and so forth, but did you ever hear of one being arrested for eloping with a married woman? No? Well, that was one of my first adventures. I struck a farmhouse one day in Connecticut, and the farmer's wife gave me the best dinner I had had in a month. She was very inquisitive about life on the road, and she gave me to understand that she was not living happily with her husband. He was away from home that day, and before we were through talking she announced that she proposed to flee from home and become a dilapidated gentlewoman. Yes, sir, she was going to take to the road and become a tramp, and in my company at that, and she was so determined that it scared me. I began to argue with her, but she cut me short. She'd either take to the road or jump down the family well.

"I FOUND A WEAK SPOT IN THE WALL AND WENT OUT."

"The only way out of it for me was to promise to wait for her at a certain crossroads three miles away that night. She would have given me all her husband's spare clothing and a sum of money, but I wouldn't take them. I didn't wait for her at the crossroads, as agreed, but went on for four miles farther and turned in under a haystack. I routed out at daylight just as she came along looking for me, and as we stood there in the road arguing her husband and a constable came along, and we were gathered in. The husband wanted to kill me on the spot, and the constable promised me a thousand years in state prison. The wife was taken back home by force, and I was run into jail and afterward given a sentence of ninety days. They were a little doubtful about the elopement charge, and so they changed it to vagrancy. After five days in the coop I found a weak spot in the wall and went out, and over twenty other prisoners followed me. I think I squared things.

Resembled Another Man.

"In Pennsylvania, once upon a time, a motherly woman, the wife of a village carpenter, opened the kitchen door to me and then yelled out 'Tom!' and reeled back into a chair. My name isn't Tom, and it took me ten minutes to solve that puzzle. It appeared that I closely resembled a certain Tom to whom she was engaged several years before and who mysteriously disappeared. After waiting a year for him to show up she married the carpenter, but was an unhappy woman. Say, now, that woman must have been awfully nearsighted and had something wrong with her ears, or my resemblance to her lost Tom must have been something marvelous. It was no use for me to deny that I was Tom. I had his look and voice and build, and, having found me, she did not propose to let me go again. She was just set on going on the tramp with me, and when she went into hysterics over it I could think of no other plan but to agree. I was to wait for her at a bridge over a river five miles away, but I intended to keep walking all night. See what a trick luck played me.

"A farmer baited me before I reached the bridge and offered me a dollar and a night's lodging to help him kill a fat steer. Next morning the woman was picked up at the bridge, where she had waited for hours, and soon thereafter I was a prisoner. I admitted nothing and denied nothing. She was a woman, you see. They didn't charge me with alienating the wife's affections, but with firing a haystack six or seven miles away. I was railroaded to jail for six months, kept in chains for twenty days as a desperado, and then I went out through a hole in the wall and left a flaming old barrack behind me. I am no man to go back on a woman, but you see she had eloped by herself and with herself. I hadn't anything to do with it. They simply dragged me into the affair by the heels, and it cost the county $30,000 to build a new jail. The old one must have caught fire through spontaneous combustion.

"One August day a few years ago I was headed for Newport and my villa when I saw smoke issuing from a farmer's barn. I jumped the roadside fence, ran to the barn and saw that it was on fire and then hustled for the house and gave the alarm. The farmer had two hired men, and the family were eating dinner. All rushed for the barn, but it was too late. I worked as hard as any one in trying to save things and as a reward was taken into custody as an incendiary. The farmer pretended to remember that I had come along two or three years before and made threats because he would not feed me.

"I was locked up in the smokehouse while messengers were sent for a constable. Travelers on the highway and other farmers gathered, and for a time there was talk of stringing me up to a limb. Did I protest and deny? Not a word. It would have been breath thrown away. I caught just one sympathetic look in that crowd, and that was from the farmer's wife. Soon after I had been locked up the fire spread to a wagon shed, calling the crowd away, and then the woman came to the smokehouse and passed me a crowbar through a little wicket and said:

"'Dig your way out through the back wall as soon as you can. My husband set the barn on fire with his pipe, but they will send you to prison if you don't get away.'

Stammered His Thanks.

"I began to stammer my thanks, but she cut me short by saying that she would meet me at a certain dead tree a mile down the road at 11 o'clock that night and go on the tramp with me, and so I turned to my work. The smokehouse was of brick, but I busted out a wall in five minutes and took leg bail through the orchard. At 11 o'clock that night I was ten miles away and still going. I can't say that the woman kept the dead tree date, but the chances are even up that she did. She probably called it a case of ingratitude on my part, but it wasn't. It was doing the best thing for her to keep away.

"To get a case nearer home, I came into town two weeks earlier last fall than usual on account of a woman. In sauntering through New Jersey a constable picked me up on a charge of horse stealing, the very last offense against the law that a dilapidated gentleman would think of committing. He might as well steal a sawmill. However, I should probably have been convicted of the crime had not the real thief confessed. That put the court in a hole, and to get even with me I was charged with being a suspicious person and given a sentence of thirty days. Over in Jersey you are a suspicious person if you can't tell how far it is from the Cape of Good Hope to New Zealand. It was thirty days or a fine of $10, and a widow among the spectators in court stepped forward and came down with the cash. She said I could go home with her and work out the fine trimming the orchard and digging potatoes, and she pretended to see the closest kind of resemblance between me and a schoolmaster who had once loved her, but died before the matrimonial knot could be tied. What did I do? Why, just as any sensible, chivalric dilapidated gentleman should do. You could see romance, sentiment and a spirit of adventure in that woman's eyes, and after expressing my thanks for her kindness I got out of the courtroom through a window and ran for dear life. Several men took after me, but they stood no show. When a d. g. is running away from a woman filled with romance and ready to go tramping he has wings, and it takes an aeroplane to overhaul him." M. SICKROOM COMFORT

SENSIBLE PREPARATION FOR EMERGENCIES.

One Woman Keeps Reserve Stock of Garments Used Only in Cases of Illness—A Very Good Suggestion.

While invalidism is no longer considered interesting, and the ambition of every woman is to be healthy and active, still in every household there are emergencies, sharp and sudden illnesses and often, alas, chronic sickness, whose victims, after exhausting modern medical and surgical science, must resign themselves to life with a minimum of pain, but never actual freedom from it.

Every woman should have, especially in winter, a sufficient supply of negligees, nightdresses, etc., to be comfortable in case of sudden illness. "In time of health prepare for the doctor's coming," is the way the mother of a growing family paraphrases the familiar line. And she lives up to her motto, keeping in her linen closet a reserve stock of shapeless garments, kimonos, nightingales, bathrobes, knitted slippers, etc., to meet any emergency.

"You would be surprised how useful I find this little stock of 'comfy' things," she explained. "Once when my second daughter was taken ill with pneumonia we had to rush out and buy all sorts of warm things. Her bed room slippers were too soiled to use in bed between clean sheets. The edges of her long kimonos and the sleeves of her short ones ditto. Her thick bathrobe was ready for the wash. I had my lesson. From that day to this we have kept the 'invalid shelf' supplied with needful things.

"This list includes bed slippers made from elderdown flannel in three sizes, so no matter who is sick, father, sister or baby, a pair will be at hand. I have three sizes also of bathrobes made from single-faced elderdown, which are washed after each illness. Then I have short kimonos made of good heavy wash flannel and a couple of nightingales in cashmere for convalescent days. And most important of all are our sickroom nighties, very simple, without lace or embroidery to scratch sensitive skins, and open all the way down the front, so that an amateur nurse will have no trouble changing the patient."

While it may not be possible for all households to enjoy this extra supply of bedroom clothing, the forehanded housekeeper has handed out some excellent suggestions for making clothing for invalids.

One of her best suggestions is that of the open-in-the-front nightdress. For the past few years the craze for French underwear has brought into vogue the pattern which slips over the head and is drawn into shape by wash ribbons. These are most inconvenient in the sickroom, but their general effect can be secured if the vent down the front be finished with a finely stitched hem and small, inconspicuous buttons.

Our picture shows an ideal short kimono to wear over the nightdress in bed. The underarm portions extend up to form the lower section of the sleeve, and the result is a loose garment which could not bind or distress the most nervous sufferer. The original garment from which this drawing was made was of pale gray French cashmere with embroidered violets in natural color scattered over it. The collar and cuffs were of the violet colored silk, lightly embroidered in self-tone and the little garment was lined throughout with very thin violet colored china silk.

White Gloves Banished.

White gloves are no longer worn in the street, or, indeed, anywhere. For all occasions gloves are either carefully matched to the costume or selected from pale shades of flesh, biscuit and tan, besides the natural tones of suede. Evening shoes are of silk or satin to match the gown, embroidered with tiny pearls, beads and jet; they are further beautified by gold or silvered Louis XV. heels and big buckles.

Ancnt Lace Buttons.

So frequently the little lace buttons on sleeves are not laundered as well as the garment itself, or else if they are perfectly clean, they go into holes almost immediately on the washboard. A small hand scrub is the way out; not half so hard on the buttons or on the cuffs, and it insures the absolute cleanliness of the button.

GULLIBLE AMERICANS.

Francis Wilson, the noted comedian, apropos of certain curios wherein he believed he had been duped, said, with a light laugh:

"The collector, as he pursues his hobby, grows in knowledge. Then, reviewing his collection, he sadly finds many an instance where he has been duped.

"The one drawback to knowledge is that it reveals so many dupes and swindles to us. One summer, for instance, I was in Switzerland.

"In the neighborhood of Geneva, where the Swiss talk French, I climbed a little peak one fine morning, and on my arrival at the chalet at the top I heard the pretty handmaiden call into the kitchen in excellent French:

"'Quick, mother, quick! Here's a tourist! Put some milk on the fire. You know they always like it warm from the cow!'"—Judge.

A QUICK CURE.

Doctor—Take this powder. It will cure that heavy feeling that you complain of.

Patient—Thanks! How much do I owe you?

Doctor—Three dollars.

Patient (paying)—That remedy is effective, doctor! I feel myself lighter already!—Dorfbarbier.

A WARM ROAST DELIVERED BY EX-GOV. WARFIELD

Charges Senator Smith With Buying Baltimore Organization for $20,000

In the course of a bitter arraignment of the Democratic organization in Maryland ex-Governor Warfield said that Senator Smith had bought the Baltimore city organization from ex-Governor Brown in the last Senatorial primaries for $20,000.

Mr. Warfield's speech was delivered at Lisbon, Howard county, Saturday afternoon, while the election to select delegates to the Democratic State Convention was being held.

Ex-Governor Brown, when interviewed, declared Mr. Warfield's statement regarding the alleged "deal" was untrue.

Mr. Warfield also pleaded for changes in the Primary Election law and for a Senatorial primary law. He declared:

"The organization does not represent the great Democratic party, but only a clique of men who are exploiting it and using it for their own personal benefit.

"With few exceptions, the members of the State Central Committee are officeholders or the puppets of some officeholders.

"I do not think that men who are holding office should control the party machinery so they can perpetuate themselves in office."

The former governor challenges United States Senator John Walter Smith to publish an itemized account of his expenditures in the senatorial primaries, declaring: "I think you would be very much astonished at that statement."

The ex-governor denied the statement of State Senator Gorman that the primary election in Howard county was fair, and offered to give $100 to charity for evidence that he ever spent one cent in the county.

Marriage Licenses.

The following licenses have been issued by Clerk E. Z. Tower, since our last report:

Alpha Glover and Edith Sowers, both of Crellin.

B. Walter Myers and Martha Fearer, both of Hinebaugh.

George Larke and Ethel Williams, both of Wilsonburg, W. Va.

Thomas C. Casteel and Ida May Teats, both of near Friendsville.

S. J. Wilt and Sarah McIntyre, both of Bond.

Edward E. Mallory and Rose Riggs, both of Ellenboro, W. Va.

Homer Mayfield, of Rohr, W. Va., and Ettie Walker of Easton, W. Va.

John Toothman and Ocie Toothman, both of Mannington, W. Va.

James O. Bleigh and Lucy Houghton, both of Ireland, W. Va.

C. M. Young, of Corinth, and Ida Whitehair, of Hutton.

Von Tucker and Mary Peterson, both of Fairmont, W. Va.

A. P. Armstrong and Laura Bryson, both of Morgantown, W. Va.

$100,000 Fire at Monongah.

Monongah, a mining town near Fairmont, W. Va., was visited by a $100,000 fire Saturday morning. Two blocks containing 21 buildings, were burned to the ground. The fire started at 4.30. a. m. in Mrs. Grace's restaurant. George Naseth, owner of a large store, jumped through a window and was badly cut. The water pressure was weak. Several buildings had to be dynamited in order to save the town. Very little insurance was carried by the property owners. The loss of Levi Oliver, owner of a department store, is $38,000. The Fairmont fire department went to the scene and helped to put down the flames.

HOYES.

The weather at this time is most beautiful, yet the atmosphere is a little cool and it reminds one of the near approaching autumn.

Mrs. Mary Enlow, of Red House, has been visiting relatives and friends in Hoyes and Sang Run the past two weeks.

Mrs. Berger and three daughters, of Connellsville, Pa., returned home last Monday after spending ten days at "Mattingly Lodge."

Miss Susan Myers, of near Selbysport, is the guest of her uncle, F. D. DeWitt.

Miss Blanche Callis left Hoyes last Saturday for an extended visit to her sister, Mrs. Guy Harvey, at Hubbard, W. Va.

Roy Friend and wife are happy over the arrival of a new daughter at their home recently.

Jerome McCleary, wife and little daughter, of Johnstown, Pa., are the guests of Mr. McCleary's aunt, Mrs. A. C. DeWitt.

Mrs. Asa Friend and son spent last Sunday with N. C. Browning and family at Sang Run.

Percy Loudermilk and wife returned to their home at Monongahela, Pa., last Saturday after a week's visit to the old homestead of Mr. Loudermilk.

Rev. H. E. Friend and daughter, Miss Sadie, attended the dedication of the M. E. church at Dodge, last Sunday, Rev. Friend being the pastor of that church.

Mrs. Frank DeWitt and Mrs. Carl Glotfelty, of near Deer Park, were in Hoyes a few days last week with Mrs. DeWitt's mother, Mrs. Ellen Wilburn, who has been an invalid for the past two years.

Messrs. Hoult Friend and Charles Jennings, of Morgantown, W. Va., two champion pedestrians, arrived in Hoyes Monday evening and spent the night with Rev. H. E. Friend and family. They left Tuesday morning for Grantsville. They expect to visit Frostburg, Uniontown and other points before returning home.

W. W. Savage, wife and child were pleasantly entertained at the home of S. K. Welch Sunday.

Mr. Solomon Boyer, an aged and highly respected citizen, died at his home at this place, Tuesday morning. He was sadly afflicted for several months past. He had reached the good old age of 81 years.

BITTINGER.

Much council has been given regarding the selection of appropriate names for children and the man in a rural district, who was known among his neighbors as John Bust, evidently cleared his conscience on that score when he named his two children Anna May and John Will.

Jennings Bros. are arranging to thresh their wheat crop on the Cunningham farm this week. The probable yield has been estimated at from 1000 to 1200 bushels.

Miss Myrtle Wiley and her friend Miss Baker, of Cumberland are spending their vacation with Miss Wiley's parents at this place.

C. W. Engle, who spent last week with his parents at this place, returned to Baltimore last Saturday to resume his duties in the custom service at the port in that city.

Mrs. Henry Winterburg and children, of Cumberland, are visiting relatives here this week.

W. A. Althers is a guest at Peter G. Stark's home this week.

Rev. J. B. Shoup left here last Friday for Springfield and Dayton, Ohio, where he will visit relatives and will go from there to Salt Lake City to attend the annual meeting of the G. A. R.

The Democratic primary election held at this place on last Saturday was very sparingly attended, as only ten ballots were cast.

The picnic to be held at this place on Saturday, August 7th, is hoped to afford a day of real pleasure to all who attend and we hope for a large gathering of people.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Natural gas is now assured at the Park within a few weeks. The matter was definitely settled at a session of the annual meeting held Tuesday last when the people authorized the annual committee to grant a franchise to the Northern Natural Gas Company.

The High School brass band of Fairmont, W. Va., gave its first open air concert here Tuesday afternoon. The band made a good impression both as to their music and personnel.

The advance sales of season tickets and the attendance on the opening night largely exceeded last year, which is very encouraging to the management.

The following are the most prominent features of the Chautauqua program for the next seven days:

Friday, 6th—"Fraternal Day," when excursion trains will come from east and west. At 11.00 Monologue Reading, "The Dawn of a Tomorrow," Miss Margaret Stahl. 1.00 p. m., Odd-Fellows mass meeting. 3.00 p. m. lecture, "A Hunted Warrior," Jos. K. Griffis (Tahan) in Indian costume. 8.00 p. m. grand concert.

Saturday, 7th—11.00 a. m., lecture, "The United States in the Orient," by W. E. Norris, Washington, D. C. 8.15 p. m., "Homelife in Dixie During the War," by Dr. S. A. Steele of Texas.

Sunday, 8th—Preaching at 11.00 a. m. by Dr. Steele and eventide concert with stereopticon views at 7.00 p. m.

Monday, 9th—8.15 p. m. lecture, "The University of Hard Knocks," by Ralph Parlette.

Tuesday, 10th—10.00 a. m., Children's Story Telling Hour, Miss Anna Chadwick, of Los Angeles, Cal. 11.00 a. m., lecture, "Pockets and Paradise," Ralph Parlette. 8.00 p. m., Evening of Magic and Mystery, Eugene Laurant.

Wednesday, 11th.—10.00 a. m., Children's Story Telling Hour, Miss Chadwick. 11.00 a. m., lecture, "Our Boys." Frederick W. Collins. 8.00 p. m., "A Calabrian Love Tragedy," illustrated with stereopticon views and vocal selections on the auxetophone.

Thursday, 12th—11.00 a. m., lecture, "Alexander Hamilton," Mr. Frederick W. Collins. 8.00 p. m., "The Appeal of the People's Song," illustrated with stereopticon views and vocal selections faultlessly rendered on the great auxetophone reproducing the voices of the great singers of the present time.

Rev. Nicola Di Stefano was at the Park Monday evening. He had been assisting Rev. Crabtree in special services at Corinth and Crellin the past week when a large class of probationers were admitted to full membership. At two of the services Rev. Stefano preached both in English and Italian, a number of his fellow countrymen being in attendance.

There will be preaching in the M. E. church every Sunday evening during the Chautauqua at 8.15 o'clock.

Mr. H. N. Cuppett, who has been ill for three weeks, is again on duty.

Mrs. Proudfoot died suddenly Monday morning, of hemorrhage of the lungs, at the residence of her son, W. H. Mallette, opposite the Association office, Mt. Lake Park.

McHENRY.

Hay making is the order of the day.

Mr. Jesse Glotfelty and daughter, Miss Sarah, made a flying trip to Oakland Saturday.

Mrs. F. F. Patton, of Uniontown, Pa., is visiting relatives and friends at McHenry.

The quarterly meeting held here last Sunday was well attended and was conducted by Rev. Johnson, of Mountain Lake Park.

Mr. Asa Glotfelty made a flying trip to Friendsville one day last week.

Messrs. T. C. Hinebaugh and Jonas Brant are the hustling loggers for the Red Brush Lumber company.

Miss Sarah Savage spent several days last week with her sister, Mrs. Walter Savage, at Sang Run.

Misses Mary Browning and Ada DeWitt and Messrs. Gilbert Enlow and Arthur DeWitt all took dinner at the home of Lemuel Savage last Sunday.

Mr. F. O. Glotfelty and family are visiting his parents.

Miss Florence Edwards, of Sang Run, spent several days last week with Miss Hattie Glotfelty.

Dr. Bassell, of New York, who has been spending a few weeks here, expects to return home Monday.

Miss Georgia Lowdermilk spent a few days last week with Miss Ethel Glotfelty.

Mrs. Howard Brenneman was on the sick list last week, but is somewhat improved at this writing.

Mr. Lemuel Savage attended court at Oakland Saturday.

Mr. George Glotfelty made a flying trip to Oakland Saturday.

A NOTABLE VICTORY.

President Taft has won a notable victory over the reactionary elements of of his party in Congress, says the Baltimore Sun. He has achieved this triumph by a combination of tact, firmness and moral courage which reflect high credit upon his ability and determination as a leader. Mr. Taft notified the Republican members of the joint conference committee on the Tariff bill that he would not recede from his demands, on behalf of the people, for a reduction of the duties on lumber, gloves, hosiery, leather and leather goods. He warned the conferees that if the reduction for which he contends were not embodied in the conference report he would appeal over the heads of the committee, to the House and Senate direct, and that if this appeal failed he would disapprove the bill when it was sent to him. The conferees conceded the demands of Mr. Taft. They realized that the President is a man of his word, that there would be no tariff legislation at this session of Congress unless it was legislation which Mr. Taft, acting on behalf of the whole country as the President of all the people, could approve.

With his veto power President Taft has, throughout this controversy, held the whip hand over those reactionary members of his party in the Congress who have been defying the will of the people and blocking the President's efforts to obtain honest tariff revision in the interest of the masses. President Taft, it now appears, would not have hesitated to resort to the veto if the extremists in Congress had not come to their senses.

Mr. Taft could not have yielded to the extremists without sacrificing the masses. He could not, as a conscientious, highminded Republican, the head of his party, sanction a betrayal of the people by the reactionary elements of his party without loss to himself of prestige, without the impairment of his influence with the people, and probably without disastrous consequences to his party. He had a plain duty to perform and the will and the power to perform it effectually. The favored beneficiaries of the Aldrich-Payne schedule—the trusts, the "interests" and their friends in Congress—will be enraged because the President has blocked their schemes. But the President can regard their rage with indifference, because he has the approval of his own conscience and the indorsement of the people.

The President is to be congratulated upon his victory. He has demonstrated that the Chief Magistrate of the United States can protect the interests of the people without resorting to spectacular methods, without blustering, without sacrificing in anyway the dignity of his exalted office. And that adds to the magnitude of his achievement.

Who Lost?

This the popular puzzle over the state just now: A banker going home to dinner saw a $10 bill on the curbstone. He picked it up, noted the number and went home to dinner. While at home his wife remarked that the butcher had sent a bill amounting to $10. The only money he had was the bill he had found which he gave to her, and she paid the butcher. The butcher paid it to a farmer for a calf, the farmer to the merchant, who in turn paid it to a washerwoman, and she, owing the banker a note of $10, went to the bank and paid the note. The banker recognized the bill as the one he had found, and which to that time had paid $50 worth of debt. On careful examination he discovered that the bill was counterfeit. Now what was lost in the transaction, and by whom?—Kansas City Journal.

A NOTABLE VICTORY.

President Taft has won a notable victory over the reactionary elements of of his party in Congress, says the Baltimore Sun. He has achieved this triumph by a combination of tact, firmness and moral courage which reflect high credit upon his ability and determination as a leader. Mr. Taft notified the Republican members of the joint conference committee on the Tariff bill that he would not recede from his demands, on behalf of the people, for a reduction of the duties on lumber, gloves, hosiery, leather and leather goods. He warned the conferees that if the reduction for which he contends were not embodied in the conference report he would appeal over the heads of the committee, to the House and Senate direct, and that if this appeal failed he would disapprove the bill when it was sent to him. The conferees conceded the demands of Mr. Taft. They realized that the President is a man of his word, that there would be no tariff legislation at this session of Congress unless it was legislation which Mr. Taft, acting on behalf of the whole country as the President of all the people, could approve.

With his veto power President Taft has, throughout this controversy, held the whip hand over those reactionary members of his party in the Congress who have been defying the will of the people and blocking the President's efforts to obtain honest tariff revision in the interest of the masses. President Taft, it now appears, would not have hesitated to resort to the veto if the extremists in Congress had not come to their senses.

Mr. Taft could not have yielded to the extremists without sacrificing the masses. He could not, as a conscientious, highminded Republican, the head of his party, sanction a betrayal of the people by the reactionary elements of his party without loss to himself of prestige, without the impairment of his influence with the people, and probably without disastrous consequences to his party. He had a plain duty to perform and the will and the power to perform it effectually. The favored beneficiaries of the Aldrich-Payne schedule—the trusts, the "interests" and their friends in Congress—will be enraged because the President has blocked their schemes. But the President can regard their rage with indifference, because he has the approval of his own conscience and the indorsement of the people.

The President is to be congratulated upon his victory. He has demonstrated that the Chief Magistrate of the United States can protect the interests of the people without resorting to spectacular methods, without blustering, without sacrificing in anyway the dignity of his exalted office. And that adds to the magnitude of his achievement.

Who Lost?

This the popular puzzle over the state just now: A banker going home to dinner saw a $10 bill on the curbstone. He picked it up, noted the number and went home to dinner. While at home his wife remarked that the butcher had sent a bill amounting to $10. The only money he had was the bill he had found which he gave to her, and she paid the butcher. The butcher paid it to a farmer for a calf, the farmer to the merchant, who in turn paid it to a washerwoman, and she, owing the banker a note of $10, went to the bank and paid the note. The banker recognized the bill as the one he had found, and which to that time had paid $50 worth of debt. On careful examination he discovered that the bill was counterfeit. Now what was lost in the transaction, and by whom?—Kansas City Journal.

INSURGENTS GET COLD SHOULDER IN CONVENTION

Hamill Wing of the Local Democracy Shown Little Consideration.

The Garrett county Democrats who went to Baltimore last Monday to attend the State Convention, returned to Oakland this morning, or at least the majority of them did, including ex-Senator R. T. Browning, Editor Charles A. Deffinbaugh, School Examiner Ed. A. Browning, Dr. E. H. Bartlett, members of the Browning or regular camp, and Messrs. S. K. Schlossnagle and Thomas J. Browning, of the insurgents, leaving Mr. G. Semmes Hamill the insurgent leader, in Baltimore.

In the convention yesterday the fight which started here at the recent primaries and continued on Tuesday of last week when the vote was canvassed, was fought out to a finish before the meeting of the state, when ex-Senator Browning and his forces put the Hamill contingent to rout, completely demoralizing the "insurgent" camp and coming off with plumes waving and the crown of victory carried high.

Governor Crothers presided at the convention and as Mr. Browning has recently come into his own again he had the ear of not only the Governor but all other leaders of the State, therefore it was an easy victory after the committee on credentials made its report seating the Hamill delegates but with the proviso that they were not to have any voice in the proceedings of that body. Mr. Hamill attempted to speak but was ruled out of order by the presiding officer and he took his seat with ill grace.

Where Mr. Browning made his touchdown, however, was in the naming of the majority members of the committee which will control the organization in Garrett county for the next two years. This body is composed of Mr. Browning and his close personal friend, Mr. M. R. Hamili, of Oakland. Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, against the expressed wishes of his friends from Garrett county, had himself named as the third member of the committee.

With this lineup of the committee Mr. Browning and his friends are again in the ascendancy, while Mr. Hamill will retire as chairman and grand Pooh Bah of the local organization.

MR. GREEN'S TEMPERANCE RECORD

A Correspondent from District No. 3 Reviews It.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Since Mr. Green's record has been under scrutiny through the public prints, I have made a cursory investigation of some of his temperance stunts.

Shortly after the recent session of the Legislature met Mr. Green introduced and had passed a bill which effectually put every saloon man in Garrett county out of business. This law was signed by the Governor and was to be effective on May 1st following. When the true import of the measure became known to the saloon interests in Oakland and other parts of the county a delegation of liquor men, including Mr. C. A. Bender, of Grantsville, went to Annapolis, where Mr. Green was all smiles and assured the gentlemen composing the delegation that he would do anything in his power to undo the work he had done and in this he was sincere, for a bill was introduced, passed and signed by the Governor repealing the first measure and allowing the liquor interests the same privileges enjoyed in the beginning.

In this instance Mr. Green showed his subserviency to the liquor people and his somersault from his temperance position two years ago and which he is at present trying to maintain before the people of his home district, is a forerunner of what may be expected of him in the future.

Was Not Seriously Hurt.

The daily papers of Monday contained a telegram from Pueblo, Col., conveying the information of a wreck which occurred on Monday at Avondale, Col., in which five passengers were injured, among them being Mr. Franklin E. Rathbun, a former associate editor of this paper but now superintendent of schools in Piedmont, W. Va. When the news reached Mr. Rathbun's former home at Mountain Lake Park telegrams were sent to Pueblo and other cities nearby making inquiry concerning the injured man and as none were answered his friends were very much agitated. Yesterday morning, however, their fears were set at rest when Mr. Rathbun passed through the Park on train No. 2. His injuries consisted of a badly bruised leg and a few minor cuts.

DEMOCRATIC FACTIONAL STRIFE GETTING WORSE

Chairman G. Semmes Hamill Comes In For Much Criticism.

Tuesday morning's issue of the Baltimore American published the following as a special telegram from Oakland under date of Monday, the 9th, and the same is herewith republished for the benefit of our readers:

The bitterness which existed before the primaries between the two factions of the Democratic party in Garrett county has since the primaries been increasing daily. The insurgents, led by Hamill, carried the county by about 40 majority. The Browning forces were under the leadership of ex-Senator R. T. Browning. The feeling is so bitter that families are divided, some favoring one side and some the other, and in one instance a disagreement has occurred between partners who have been engaged in business for a number of years and a dissolution of partnership has resulted.

The preliminaries of the actual fight, however, did not occur until Tuesday morning last at Oakland, when the committee, under the law, was supposed to meet and canvass the vote, to certify the result of the election to the state convention. At the hour the return judges met at their office, G. Semmes Hamill, Jr., chairman of the committee, being present in his official capacity, and R. T. Browning, also a member of the committee, as a spectator. Immediately after the judges met a written protest, was handed to the chairman, in which the legality of the call for the primaries was attacked, setting forth the fact that under the law the committee, and not the chairman, was empowered to make the call.

The protest was based on the fact that the call for the primaries had been made by the chairman of the committee acting alone, who signed the names of the members of the committee to the same without consulting them and without their authority.

The law gives the power to the state central committee of the counties to make a primary call, but in this instance two members of the committee did not get the opportunity to voice their sentiments, as the chairman, without calling a meeting of the committee, dictated the manner of the procedure, issued the call, signed the names of the other members to it, apportioned the amount that each candidate was to be assessed to defray the costs, recommended all the judges and clerks, and canvassed the returns without consulting his collegues. The other member of the committee present stated that as he had not been consulted in any other manner, it was not necessary for him to take part in that.

The question of the eligibility of C. V. Guard, one of the insurgents' candidates for delegate, was also raised and protest filed, Mr. Guard being one of the election supervisors, whose duty it was to appoint judges and clerks for the primary at which he was a candidate. When the protest was laid before the chairman he entered into a discussion of its merits holding that the primary call was legal, even though made by a minority member of the committee. This led up to several speeches made by different adherents of the factions, wherein Mr. Hamill was accused of double dealing in having P. A. Chisholm appointed election supervisor sometime ago, when it was understood that King Delawder was to be appointed.

Dr. E. H. Bartlett in a speech declared that the chairman, Mr. Hamill, had called on the governor and had himself appointed chief judge of the Orphans' Court, to fill a vacancy, when it was agreed that another was to be recommended for this appointment, and, further, that he (Mr. Hamill) continued to fill the office until informed by the court that he was inelligible to practice before that tribunal, whereupon he resigned.

William Miller, for many years the chairman of the Democratic state central committee and leader of his party in the county, who several times has been its nominee for senatorial honors, always leading his ticket at the election, claims that he was forced to resign recently from the school board, due to the treachery of certain members of his party. Following this he resigned as a member of the state central committee, and publicly declars he will not have, anything further to do with Democracy.

The feeling between the two factions is very bitter and is daily growing in intensity. The seat of war will this week be transfesred to the state convention. The insurgents feel confident of their position, and it is rumored, if successful, they will name as chairman either G. Semmes Hamill, Jr., or his law partner, Tott Matthews. They have promised their friends, if successful, they will lay the preliminaries for ousting the present school board including the county examiner and assistant fish commissioner.

Everything in the Republican camp is quiet, and for several weeks past they have been royally entertained by the fight of the factions of the opposing party. There will be but few contests in the primaries on the Republican side, to be held August 14, as out of the 14 election districts in the county there are but three that will have two sets of delegates and these are friends. This number of contests is much smaller than usual. The only contest of importance is over the nomination for sheriff.

Lawrence F. Green, a member of the last House of Delegates, has withdrawn as a candidate for renomination. During the presidential campaign last fall a number of letters were written to one of the Democratic papers of the county attacking the Republican nominee, now President Taft, vigorously assailing his religion. It was rumored at the time that Mr. Green was the author of these communications, but it was not then believed by the Republicans. Later a local paper in the adjoining county (Somerset, Pa.), accused Mr. Green of writing the articles and he claimed that the editor, while he was visiting Oakland, showed him an article with Mr. Green's signature attached. This brought forth a statement from Mr. Green which the Republicans accepted as a denial, and nothing more was said about the incident until Mr. Green announced his candidacy for renomination. Following this it seems that the Democrats furnished the Republicans with the proof that Mr. Green was the author of these bitter attacks on the President. As soon as Mr. Green was informed that his Republican friends had this proof of his authorship, he at once declared that he would not be a candidate for renomination.

While the judicial contest seems to have created quite a stir in the other counties of the judicial circuit, there is very little said about it in Garrett.

The disfranchisement amendment, proposed by the Democratic state machine, will be vigorously opposed by the voters of this county. Many of the independent Democrats are opposed to its adoption.

Too Much Business.

The Kendall Lumber company of Pittsburg, for the first time in two years is refusing orders for lumber because it cannot meet the almost unprecedented demand. It has orders for 1,000,000 feet in excess of stock cut, and as a result the mills are running full capacity. The rush of orders recently has excelled the prosperous times before the business depression began in 1907. The largest demand is for hemlock lumber for building purposes and for coke slats and mine timber of all kinds. The activity in the coke fields has created a demand almost double that of a year ago.—Pittsburg Post.

Lime. Lime. Lime.

Any one wanting lime for fall crops write W M. Bishop, Terra Alta, W. Va., for prices delivered at your nearest railroad station, either in lump or granulated. Analysis of this limestone shows 89.95 carbonate of lime. We have limestone in this section that only shows 66.89 carbonate of lime. It does not require any more labor to put the high grade lime on your land and you get about 25 per cent. more lime from every ton used, or you would get as much pure lime from fifteen hundred pounds of the high grade lime as you would from two thousand pounds of the lime that only shows 66.89 carbonate of lime, therefore you handle five hundred pounds more of the low grade lime in very ton to get the same result, which is quite an item to the farmer.

A SPLENDID UNDERTAKING

Was the Mountain Lake Park Oratorical Contest.

To the Editor of The Republican:

On last Monday evening at eight o'clock was the College Oratorical Contest at Mountain Lake Park. Dr. C. W. Baldwin presided. The judges were Hon. A. Hunter Boyd, Chief Justice of the Court of Appeals; Hon. Thos. I. Elliott, member of the Supreme Bench, Baltimore, and Major J. M. Pangborn, assistant to the president of the B. & O. The gold medal, the generous gift of Hon. James S. Lakin, was awarded by Professor Thomas E. Hodges, Charleston, W. Va. The contestants and the titles of their orations, in the order of delivery, were as follows:

"The Call of Humanity," C. Edward Bender, (Chicago University), Grantsville, Md.

"The Tragedy of Labor," Minnie Jane Murrells, (W. Va. Wesleyan College), Tunnelton, W. Va.

"The Marriage Regulation Problem," George N. Stoyer, (W. Va. Wesleyan College), Stoyer, Md.

"Cromwell as a Statesman," Richard Aspinall, (W. Va. Wesleyan College), Buckhannon, W. Va.

"Crowns Trodden Under Foot," C. W. Wise, (W. Va. Wesleyan College), Amos, W. Va.

Mr. Bender's oration was on the old, yet ever new, temperance question. He treated the subject in an able and convincing manner. He spoke in a clear and forceful tone of voice, was graceful and easy in appearance, and above all, was thoroughly convinced of the truth of his message. Mr. Bender has the qualities of an orator, and Garrett county is likely to hear more of him in the future. The medal was rightly awarded.

Miss Murrells discussed the tragedy of child labor. She explained in a thoughtful and sympathetic manner the suffering of the children who are compelled to spend their days in the mines, mills, and factories; and the danger which awaits our nation if these conditions are allowed to continue. She felt with these little sufferers, as only a woman can, and the gentle and Christ-like way in which she pleaded for them touched every heart in the audience. Miss Murrells deserves great praise; for a girl to compete with men in an oratorical contest before a large and strange audience is by no means an easy task. She certainly won a close second.

Mr. Stoyer had, in my opinion, the strongest oration of the evening, but his delivery was faulty. He was stiff and formal and he recited his oration instead of speaking it from the heart. The question which he discussed is a deep one, and many of the points which he presented are worthy of thoughtful consideration by the individual and by the nation.

Mr. Aspinall had perhaps the best literary production in the contest, but he was not very effective in his manner of delivering it. His subject, however, was against him. Man is indeed a fitting subject for study, but it is the men of today with their problems that especially interest us. The "Still, sad voice of humanity" is still calling for help, and it is hopeful to see so many young men and women listening to it and trying to offer suggestions of relief. Such subjects need discussion, and will always be heard attentively.

Mr. Wise's production had the tone of a high school or college graduating oration. It had in it a little too much of the "glorious success" which awaits the young man and not enough of real thought. Acres of diamonds may lie just ahead of some men, but to most of us they seem nearer on graduation day than ever afterward.

The contest was a success. It is the first entertainment of the kind that has ever been held at Mt. Lake Park, and with such a promising beginning it bids fair to become a permanent feature. Two colleges were represented, but the majority of the contestants came from West Virginia Wesleyan College. This speaks well for Wesleyan and the work she is doing.

To two men we are mainly indebted for this excellent entertainment, Hon. James S. Lakin and Dr. W. W. Davis. Mr. Lakin's generous contribution of a twenty-five dollar medal supplied the touchstone for the contest. As Prof. Hodges said when presenting the prize, it was not for the honor that Mr. Lakin gave the medal but for the encouragement it would give to the young people to study ever and to present the great problems of today. A similar prize is to be offered by Mr. Lakin next year, and doubtless there will be a second medal from some other who is interested in this work. Dr. Davis originated the idea of the contest and spent considerable time and thought in bringing it to a successful issue. The people of the Park, and of this entire state and of the neighboring states owe him sincere thanks for this new form of entertainment.

VICTOR E. ALBRIGHT.

Next year a second prize, offered by Mr. G. S. Hamill, of Oakland, will be awarded.—[Ed. Republican.]

WILL IMPROVE THREE MILES OF NATIONAL ROAD

In Garrett County, the Surveys Now Being Made.

The following from Mr. W. W. Crosby, chief engineer of the State Highway Commission, has been given considerable publicity through the columns of the press of Allegany county, being an answer to an inquiry directed to Mr. Crosby by Col. John W. Averitt, of the Cumberland Times, respecting the reconstruction of the National Road from Eckhart, Allegany county, westward to the Garrett county line, and from thence three miles further west in Garrett county:

Baltimore, August 4, 1909.

John W. Avirett, Editor Times, Cumberland:

Dear Sir—Yours of the 3rd inst. at hand. Replying thereto, I would say, that the commission has twice advertised the work between Eckhart and the Garrett county line, in Allegany county, and neither time has it received a satisfactory bid.

A suggestion was made to the commission by several parties from Frostburg and the vicinity that it was extremely desirable to have included in the improvement in question on the section above referred to, a section west of the Garrett county line, in Garrett county, and that by making one job of the whole work, including this section in Garrett county, the amount of work would attract bigger contractors and result in better prices. The commission has therefore adopted the suggestion and instructed the engineers to prepare the plans and specifications for the work between Eckhart and a point about three miles west of the Garrett county line. As soon as these plans and specifications can be finished. I understand it is the intention of the commission to advertise the whole work.

Very truly yours,
W. W. CROSBY,
Chief Engineer.

INSPECTED GARRETT COUNTY'S BUILDINGS

Preston County Officials Made Visit to Oakland Monday.

Last Monday morning seven members of the County Court of Preston county, W. Va., in company with Mr. John W. Watson, clerk, and Prosecuting Attorney A. G. Hughes, of Kingwood, arrived in Oakland and spent the day here inspecting Garrett county's new court house and jail, the object of the visitors being to glean information with respect to the arrangement of the structures wish the view of constructing similar buildings at Kingwood in the near future. The gentlemen expressed themselves as being highly gratified with the visit made to Oaklandand are of the opinion that the buildings here are model ones and that should a definite conclusion be reached that the proposed buildings at Kingwood will be along the lines of Garrett county's structures.

The members of the court accompanying Messrs. Watson and Hughes were B. L. Brown, of Kingwood; Harrison Zinn, of Tunnelton; Joseph F. Sisler, of Terra Alta; William Spindler, of Clifton Mills; Joseph Strawser, of Eglon, and Wm. J. Matheny, of Albright. Justice Joseph A. Miller, of Kingwood, also accompanied the gentlemen and while here met his old comrade, Mr. George W. Legge, whom he had not seen since the close of the war. The meeting between the two old soldiers was mutually agreeable and pleasant.

A Good Record in the B. and O. Service.

Thos. J. Henrix has been in the employ of the B. and O. for 43 years. He quietly celebrated the anniversary on Saturday last by taking his regular run of No. 5 passenger train Baltimore to Cumberland. It was on the same day of the week, 43 years ago, that he entered the service, and made the same run, Baltimore to Cumberland, though, of course in a minor position.

Capt. Henrix was a Union soldier in the civil war, serving with distinction in an Illinois regiment, his parents having moved to the west previous to the opening of the war. He is very attentive to his passengers while making his run, and is regared as an efficient officer. H. E. Coodper, his regular brakeman, has been in the service since 1892.

THE COUNTRY PAPER.

It Is Worth More Than It Costs Fifty-Two Times Over.

The following article—taken from the Jackson (Miss.) Union Advocate, the official organ of the Farmers' union of Mississippi—is so plain and forceful a presentation of the value and importance of the country newspaper that we print it in full as it will prove of special interest to every reader of this paper. It was written by Dr. B. F. Ward, one of the most gifted men of Mississippi, ex-surgeon of the confederate states army; ex-president Mississippi State Medical association, and ex-president Mississippi State Board of Health. He is father of B. F. Ward, editor of the Union Advocate, Jackson, Miss. The article follows:

The most scantily appreciated piece of property in the world is the country newspaper. One dollar for a country paper is the cheapest investment a man ever makes. It brings richer and more abundant returns than any other one dollar we may send out in any single year.

Fifty-two times in the twelve months we collect the interest on that dollar. Fifty-two times in a year our wives and childred gather from that little paper some paragraph of information, some item of news, some gleam of patriotism, some moral sentiment, some ray of hope, some stimulus to greater and nobler effort that is worth more than the cost of the paper.

Perhaps we are not aware, at the time, that we are receiving any benefits from the modest little weekly visitor, but do not turn it away from your door without listening to its simple message. It is a faithful missionary and is sowing in the minds and hearts of your children little seed that in time will spring up and bring forth fruit one hundred fold.

Bill Arp once said that there never was a country paper that was not worth many times more than the price paid for it. He said, for instance, his father came from New England to Georgia. He was a stranger in a strange land, without money, or friends. He stopped in a little village and paid a dollar for the country newspaper. In the first number he saw a notice of a teacher wanted for a little country school. He applied immediately and was elected. In that school was a bright-eyed, curly haired little girl. When the school closed he was in love with her. He married her and she was Bill Arp's mother.

Now, says Arp: "If my father had not subscribed for that little country newspaper he would never have gotten that school; he would never have seen that little girl, and I might have been somebody else."

And, we may safely add, the world might never have enjoyed the golden fruits of Bill Arp's pen. This is a humorous illustration, but a very apt one, of the hundreds of ways in which little bits of information gleaned from the country paper may lead to great events and happy results.

Prentiss once said that "it is not what a man knows that makes him great, but the use he makes of what he may know."

The country paper is the school teacher in the family, and charges only one dollar for a year's tuition. This generous little teacher never misses a week on account of sickness; never "keeps the children in;" never uses a hickory, nor makes them eat cold dinners.

I am sorry for a man when I hear him say "I never read the country paper because there is nothing in it." Bill Arp's father found something in it.

That is the reason there is so little in it, because so few citizens of the country read it. It cannot be a large, strong newspaper if the people of the country do not support it. Every town has as good a paper as it deserves, because a paper is usually valuable in proportion to its patronage.

You pay one dollar and get all the country news; births, marriages, divorces and deaths, You get the proceedings of the courts and boards of supervisors. You see real estate advertised for sale or rent, often at a bargain. Looking over a small country newspaper a few days ago, I saw over 5,000 acres of land advertised for sale in different parts of the state, giving character of land, improvements, price and terms of payments.

The information on the patent side of a country newspaper is worth more than five dollars a year to a family in which there are boys and girls who have but little time to read.

One dollar a year is the price of one show ticket, though I have no objection to shows. It is the price of a bottle of whiskey, in which there is no good, but much harm. It is about the price of four little chickens, or four dozen eggs, or four pounds of butter, a bushel of potatoes, or a half bushel of peas,

Many prosperous people cheerfully drop a dollar in the hat for the heathen, but would not buy the country paper for a dollar or a little more and send it to some neighbor, or boy or girl, who is not able to pay for it.

The country paper is the genuine, honest and fearless representative of the people. Most of the great metropolitan papers are strictly business institutions, commercial enterprises, and more or less in the service of corporations, monopolies, forceful political factions or controlling money interests of some kind.

No combination of capital thinks of buying the country newspaper, because they are not considered sufficiently political to justify the investment. Hence they are left free to speak and advocate their honest opinions.

There is naturally more independence and unselfish patriotism among the readers of the country paper, because they are farther removed from the corrupting influences that radiate from the center of organized capital. A well conducted country paper is a potent factor in fostering and maintaining a healthy and redeeming spirit among the rural population.

It may not be out of place for me to state that I have no personal interest in advocating a liberal support of country papers. I never had and never expect to have a dollar invested, except my subscription, in a newspaper of any kind. It is simply my candid opinion, after many years of observation, that country papers give to the people more valuable service for less renumeration than any other institution in the land.

BALTIMORE, MD.

WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnificent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience; America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,000.00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and believe that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator is still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

JUSTICE FAR-REACHING

There are, perhaps, few virtues that need to be more strongly emphasized or more frequently insisted upon than the virtue of justice; and it is an unquestionable truth that if there were more justice in the world there would be far less need for charity. For justice demands that we respect the rights of others and give to every man his due; and most assuredly, if this great principle characterized all our dealings with our fellow-men, if respect for the rights and property of the neighbor were universal, there would be comparatively little occasion to call on others for assistance.

From its very nature we can readily see how comprehensive the virtue of justice is. It enters into all our human relations—in the political and business world, in the family and in social life, and the ways of offending against it are various and manifold. Calumny and backbiting are contrary to justice, because they infringe on the injured man's right to his good name or reputation. Murder and assault are opposed to justice, because they violate the victim's right to bodily life and health. But the phase of the question that most directly and immediately concerns us now is a due regard for the property rights of our fellow-men.

There are, of course, very many cases in which the distinction between justice and injustice is clear-cut or well defined—where the boundary line between honesty and dishonesty is so well marked as to leave no possible room for doubt or question. But there are also numberless instances in which the injustice is not so manifest—at least, for those whose conscienee is not over-delicate in these matters and who are constantly on the lookout for loopholes of escape from the obligations of justice. And it is precisely for such cases and such persons that moralists lay down the rule that he who takes or uses the property of another against the owner's reasonable will is guilty of injustice. It matters not what name the culprit may give to his act or what his motives may have been, it is none the less a crime, and the doer deserves to be branded with the mark of injustice.

The man who deliberately fails to live up to the terms of his contract by supplying an inferior class of goods; the merchant who misrepresents the value of his wares or sells them for more than their worth; the grocer who uses false weights and measures; the servant who disposes of the master's goods without leave, even in charity; the conscious plagiarist and all who appropriate to themselves for purposes of gain the products of another's brainwork, whether in art, literature or the industrial world—all of these are (there is no need to mince words in the matter) simply thieving, and because of their greater knowledge merit far more punishment than the poor tramp or outcast who takes barely enough to keep body and soul together. The hired man who wastes or fritters away the time that belongs to his employer is just as guilty as if he stole the value of his time in cash. Equally guilty is the man who, having the use of another's goods, deliberately abuses them; the tenant or leaseholder who, through culpable neglect, allows a property to go to wreck and ruin, and the borrower who abuses the confidence reposed in him.

However, anent the relations of employer and employe, it is but just to add that there are two sides, or two parties, to a contract. It is a poor rule that won't work both ways; and if the laboring man has duties, he has his rights also. If the man who sells his time is bound to give it to his employer, the latter in turn is bound to give him a just recompense—a living wage—and should he take a mean advantage of a poor man's necessity, in accordance with sweatshop methods, he is worse than the common thief. Defrauding laborers of their just dues is mentioned in Holy Writ as one of the sins that cry to Heaven for vengeance: "Behold, the hire of the laborers who have reaped down your field, which by fraud has been kept back by you, crieth, and the cry of them hath entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth." (James, v, 4.)

Some of the things mentioned in this paper are not treated as thefts in civil law; at least, they are not punished by fine or imprisonment. But they are none the less thefts in the sight of the Almighty, and the genuinely just man will be guided in these matters not by fear of legal punishment, but rather by the dictates of the moral law.—Baltimore Sun.

"DOG DAYS."

Old-Time Superstition in Connection With Sirius, the Dog Star.

The Dog Star now rages, July 11th being the date on which "dog days" began, lasting for the following six weeks. Bites of canines during this period are supposed to be more poisonous than at any other time and all sort of venomous stings are popularly believed to be productive of greater evils than at any other period.

A few thousand years ago, Sirius, the dog star, had its heliacal rising in the period between the middle of July and the last of August and as this was the hottest period year it was supposed to result from the fact that the star so named happened to rise just before the sun. But while the eternal verities move on, superstition stands still and has utterly failed to take note of the important fact that "dog days" are no longer "dog days," as by reason of the procession of the equinoxes, Sirius has run behind the schedule and no longer precedes the sun at the mid-summer season. He "rages" at the wrong time, but that won't make any differences to the people who pin their faith to the dog day legends.

But after all it was the hot weather rather than any connection with the far away suns of another system, that produced the phenomenon of the season, so that while the ancient faiths may have been based upon an entirely false premises, whatever was truly obseverd to occur in the heated period will go right on happening whether Sirius runs on time or not.

Notwithstanding the fact that the Dog Star legends have been dispelled by science, it is still a very good precaution to avoid contact with strange or vicious dogs, not only during the hot days of July and August, but at all times.

Cement Plant Completed.

The cement plant at Manheim, Preston county, W. Va., near Rowlesburg, is about completed and ready to make cement. It will be one of the best equipped plants in the United States. Two immense turbine engines with direct connected dynamos will furnish the power. All machinery will be run by electricity. Two immense stock houses will be built, one for sack cement and one for barrel cement. All the houses are being repaired and painted and some new ones are being built.

FOR THE TURN-OVER COLLAR

Venise Filet One of the Best of Materials to Be Chosen.

The girl whose turn-over collars are worn out can make new ones on the same foundations, which will probably prove prettier than the original ones.

Irish lace, imitation and real, is not new for turn-over collars, although it is always good looking. The newer thing is Venise filet with a slightly scalloped edge. It can be bought at the shops by the yard, and is easily attached to the top of a linen foundation.

The net of the filet should be coarse and in color dead white, unless it is to be worn with a colored blouse. While imitation filet can be easily picked up, it takes such a scrap for a collar, that it is worth while buying the real in two-inch width.

When it comes to the problem of finishing the front edges, which, of course, have no scallop, there are two ways of solving it. The first is to use heavy silk, and overcast the raw edge, using a cord for padding. Another way is to buy the strip a little longer than is needed, then cut off all except the edge.

This is then turned up and applied to the raw edge of the fronts.

TO FRESHEN UP A FROCK.

Tucked Net in Skillful Hands Will Work Wonders.

The tucked net that now comes by the yard is a wonderful time saver to a busy girl.

She who finds in the morning that the gown she wishes to wear that afternoon is hopelessly shabby at yoke and sleeves need not sit to lament, but with a yard of this ready-tucked goods and an hour's time can have her gown freshed up quite like new.

By using the old sleeves for a pattern it is surprising how quickly new ones can be cut and run together by hand.

This net comes with tucks of various widths in white, cream and black.

Then there is net that is tucked in groups of threes with two or three inches space between each group, which is filled with colored dots embroidered in silk. This is not only used for yokes, but also makes up very prettily into shirt-waists.

No trimming of any kind need be used on them. They are made to fasten down the front with either crochet buttons to match the dots or with tiny rhinestone ones.

PRETTY ORNAMENT.

Pretty little Japanese cups and saucers can be bought very cheaply, many of them exquisite in design and color; and make charming ornaments with which to decorate a mantelpiece or side-board. These little articles may be filled with chocolates or sweets, and covered in at the top with silver paper, and then tastefully tied up with prettily colored ribbons, in the manner shown in the sketch. To prepare them is very little trouble, and they make a present that, after the sweets have been consumed, is well worth keeping.

Fashion for Boys.

Practically all little boys' suits this year are made with full-kneed knickerbockers and belted blouses or jerkins. In all instances the belts are loose and low. Little girls' skirts all flare from the waist and come a little below the knee. Where belted, the stiff belts are set low and are worn perfectly loose. For trimming crash suits cotton amazon braid and fancy narrow tapes are used. Pearl buttons or bone ones of simple form are all that is necessary. Boys' collars—and, for that matter, those for little girls may be managed in exactly the same way—are now provided with underloops in the back; the blouse is then supplied with buttons to correspond with these loops, and, thus secured, the collar is guaranteed to hold in place even throughout a really strenuous game. The little loose pinafores that button on the shoulders or just slip over the head are most useful because so easily laundered.—Harper's Bazar.

Home-Made Jabot.

At the places where Irish lace is sold there comes a tiny scalloped edge, and this can be used with good result on a small bit of inexpensive silk mull.

The two combined make a dainty and costly looking jabot for a turnover collar at a small price. The silk mull is plain or dotted, and sells for about 25 cents a yard.

If this is made into six fine plaits about four inches long, with a tab and a buttonhole at top, then edged with the Iris's scallop, it can be worn with one's smartest blouse or sent as a gift to a critical friend.

Paint a Hair Bow.

When you want to give a little girl something to delight her birthday heart, paint her a hair bow. A very good quality of taffeta ribbon, six inches wide, white or the very lightest blue or pink—but the artist will have more choice of colors if the ribbon be white

SURE REMEDY FOR HICCOUGHS.

Science at Last Has Devised Cure for Troublesome Complaint.

Did you ever take nine swallows of water to cure the hiccoughs? Do you remember the time some one scared the hiccoughs away by telling you of a whipping due for some meanness?

Well, science has been studying hiccoughs and caught the hiccoughs by the "nape of the neck." The nine swallows of water had a little science in it, and so did the scare cure. scientific hiccough cure consists pressing down to numbness the nerve that connects the stomach, heart, lungs and brain, the pneumogastric nerve. The pressure partially and locally paralyzes this nerve and of necessity the hiccoughing must cease.

Have the hiccoughing patient sit down and be at ease, with the muscles of the neck relaxed as much as possible. Grasp both sides of the neck somewhat toward the back part and press down steadily and as hard as the subject may permit for about one minute, having the patient work the head from side to side. Within about one minute the nerve will be numbed and rested and the spasmodic motion will cease. It may require longer pressure is some cases, but the result is sure if patience is maintained.

COULD INTRODUCE THEM ALL.

One Guest, at Least, at Dinner Party Who Knew the Host.

In a volume lately published in London, "Piccadilly to Pall Mall," there is this queer anecdote of the vagaries of social life in the capital: Some years ago an eminent personage accepted, or suggested, a dinner with a certain millionaire, at that time comparatively unknown. The first guest to arrive, having explained to the butler that being unacquainted with his host he would wait till some one else came who could introduce him, lingered in the hall. The second was in the same predicament, as were the third, fourth, fifth, and other guests up to the ninth, who chanced to be "the eminent personage" himself. Upon the dilemma being explained to him, he cheerfully said: "Oh, come along with me. I will introduce you all—I know him."

Mental Suggestion for Health.

Suggestible as is the conscious mind, the subconscious is still more so. Now we know that at least twice a day we all have brief periods during which the subconscious is in evidence and during which therefore, we are especially suggestible. These two periods are those immediately preceding and immediately succeeding sleep. We are then in a half-waking and half-sleeping condition, and any suggestion offered to the mind in that state is in some inexplicable way, taken up by the brain mechanism and realized. Let the worrier, then, use well these few minutes at night and in the morning, by saturating his brain with suggestions that make against worry and that make for peace, poise and nervous balance.—Rev. S. S. McComb, in Harper's Bazar.

Opposed All Education.

The Abecedarians were the followers of one Nikolaus Storch, a clothmaker of Wittenberg, who flourished in 1522. He proclaimed fanatical views that are commonly called Anabaptist, and soon gathered a considerable following.

The foundation of their faith was that it was best not to know how to read, since the Holy Spirit would convey knowledge of the Scriptures directly to the understanding. They contended, therefore, that as education might be a hindrance to salvation it must be avoided as a pest. They encouraged pupils to desert the schools and universities and take up humble trades.

The Skylark's Song.

The skylark of England does not sing in winter, but in the early days of spring the great flocks of these birds break up, and they go in pairs to hunt for places to build their nests and rear their young. It is then that the song of the bird is heard in all its sweetness. While the mother-bird is sitting on her nest, her mate often rises in the air, and with quivering wing mounts straight upwards so far that he looks like a mere speck in the sky. And all the time he pours forth his rich and beautiful song, ceasing only as he descends again to the nest.

His Favorite Game-Bird.

At a dinner one day, says a writer in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, some men were discussing the merits of different kinds of game-birds. One preferred canvasback duck, another, woodcock, and still another thought a quail the most delicious article of food. The discussion and the dinner ended at about the same time.

"Now, Frank," said one of the men to the waiter at his elbow, "what kind of game do you like best?"

"Well, suh, to tell the truf, I likes any kind of game suits me, but what I like best is an American eagle served on a silver dollar."—Youth's Companion.

The Irony of Fate.

An old Jewish woman on the East side of New York was bewailing the death of her daughter, who had just been left a widow with a large family, with no one to depend upon for support but her own parents.

"Vell, vell," bewailed the old woman. "That my daughter's husband should die and leafe her with seven girls, and their granfader in the boys' clothing business!"

GEN. NELSON A. MILES AND THE SIOUX

Story of the Last Outbreak of the Great American Indians.

A lithograph that has survived the attacks of time shows Gen. Nelson A. Miles and Col. W. F. Cody mounted on spirited horses and overlooking from a bluff the last great camp of the Sioux Indians when coming in from the warpath. The Sioux surrendered to Gen. Miles in January, 1891, but they came very near, a few days after the surrender, to the point of breaking away once more. The story of it is this:

Gray dawn was breaking at the Pine Ridge agency when an Indian runner broke headlong into the village of the surrendered Sioux. He stopped at the tepees of the principal warriors long enough to shout a message, and then leaving the camp where its end rested against an abrupt hill, he made his way with a plainsman's stealth to the group of agency buildings, circling which and extending beyond, crowning ridge after ridge, were the white Sibley tents of the soldiers.

Breakfast was forgotten in the troubled camp of the Sioux. The chiefs and the greater braves rushed to quick council and the lesser warriors, the squaws and the children stood waiting with dogged patience in the village streets.

The council was over. An old chief shouted a word of command that was caught up and passed quickly to the farthest outlying tepees. An army might have learned a lesson from that which followed the short, sharp order. Mounted men shot out from the village and as fast as fleet-footed ponies, pressed to their utmost, could accomplish the distances every outlying ridge was topped with figure of rider and horse, silhouetted against the morning sky.

Every sentinel warrior had his eyes on the camps of the white soldiery. Suddenly from the east of the agency, where lay the Sixth cavalry, there came a trumpet call that swelled and swelled and ended in one ringing note that sang in and out of the valleys and then, subdued to softness, floated on to be lost in the prairie wilderness beyond.

The motionless figure of one of the hilltop sentinels was moved to instant life. A signal ran from ridge to ridge, finally to be passed downward into the camp of the waiting Sioux, who sprang into action at its coming. The pony herds of the Sioux were grazing on the hills to the west, unrestrained of their freedom by lariat or herdsman. In number they nearly equaled the people of the village, a few ponies for emergency use only having been kept within the camp. Upon the ponies in the village jumped waiting warriors, who broke out of the shelter of the tepees for the hills were the herds were foraging on the snow-covered bunch grass. It seemed but a passing moment before every pony in that great grazing herd was headed for the village. The animals were as obedient to the word of command as is a brave to the word of his chief.

During the gathering of the ponies the women of the camp had slung their papooses to their backs, had collected the camp utensils and were standing ready to strike the tepees, while the braves, blanketed and with rifles in their hands, had thrown themselves between the village and the camps of the soldiers of Gen. Miles.

The Sioux, who had surrendered less than a week before, were preparing to stampede from the agency and to make necessary the repeating of a campaign that had lasted for months. The Indian runner had brought word that Great Chief Miles had ordered his soldiers to arms early in the morning and that the surrendered Sioux were to be massacred to the last man, woman and child.

The medicine men had told the Indians that this was to be their fate and the runner's word found ready belief. Miles sent a courtier with a reassuring message to the chiefs, but they would not believe.

The braves prepared to kill before they were killed and everything was in readiness for the flight of the squaws and papooses, while the warriors, following, should fight the soldiers lusting for the Sioux blood.

Gen. Miles had planned a review of the forces in the field as a last act of the campaign, and it was the order for the gathering and the marching that had been taken as an order of massacre by the suspicious Sioux.

Trumpet and bugle calls of "boots and saddles" and "assemble" burdened the air. The troopers and "doughboys" had fallen in 5,000 strong. The column started west with flags and guidons fluttering. The head of the command, the greatest that had been gathered together up to that time since the days of the civil war, reached the bluff above the Sioux village. A shout would have started the stampede of the savages; a shot would have been the signal for a volley from the warriors lying between the white column and the village.

The soldiers passed on and the review began, but out on the hills the Indian sentinels still stood, and between the marching whites and the village were the long lines of braves still suspicious and still ready to give their lives for the women and children in the heart of the valley.

What a review was that on the snow-covered South Dakota plains that January morning 18 years ago! Gen. Miles on his great black horse watched the 5,000 soldiers pass, soldiers that had stood the burden of battle and the hardships of a winter's campaign and had checked one of the greatest Indian uprisings of history.

The First infantry, led by Col. Shafter, who afterward was in command in front of Santiago, was there that day. Guy V. Henry, now lying in peaceful Arlington cemetery, rode at the head of his black troopers, the "buffalo soldiers" of the Sioux. Capt. Allen W. Capron was there with the battery that afterwards opened the the battle at Santiago. TheSeventh cavalry was there, two of its troops, B and K having barely enough men left in the ranks to form a platoon.

These two troops had borne the brunt of the fighting at Wounded Knee a month before when 90 men of the Seventh fell killed or wounded before the bullets of the Sioux. When the two troops with their attenuated ranks rode by, the reviewing general removed his cap, an honor otherwise paid only to the colors of his country.

The column filed past, broke into regiments, then into troops and companies, and the word of dismissal was given. The Indian sentinels on the ridges, signaled the camp in the valley. In another minute there was a stampede, but it was only that of the thousands of Sioux ponies turned loose and eager to get back to their breakfast of bunch grass on the prairies.

Two Strike, the Sioux, watched the review that day. Old Two Strike was one of the warriors who went out with a following of braves on the warpath the month previous. Two Strike wore no ghost shirt. He was above such superstition, even though he took no pains to urge his comrades to follow his shirtless example.

Two Strike was glad of the craze that had brought, war, for he hated the whites harder than he hated anything on earth except the Pawnees, the hereditary enemy of his people. Two Strike knew in his soul that the buffalo were not coming back as the medicine men had declared, and that no Messiah was to be raised to lead his people against the pale faces to wipe them from off the face of the continent. What he did know was that he was to have one more chance to strike at the encroachers on the lands of his people before the enfeeblements of old age took the strength from his arms.

Two Strike was a great wa rior. He had fought on many a field and he had won his name from the overcoming of two warrior foes who had attacked him when he was alone on the prairie. Single handed he had fought and killed them and "Two Strike" he had been from that day. He was the leader in the last battle which took place between hostile bands of savages on the plains of America. For years without number the two nations, the Sioux and the pawnees, had hated each other.

In one of Cooper's novels Hard Heart, a Pawnees, taunts a Sioux thus: "Since waters ran and trees grew, the Sioux has found the Pawnee on his warpath." The fight in which Two Strike was the leader of the Sioux was fought against the Pawnees on the banks of a little stream known as "The Frenchman," in Nebraska in the year 1874.

In the valley of the Platte river the buffalo were plenty, but the Pawnees had said the Sioux should not hunt there and they defied them to come. "The Pawnee dogs called the Sioux women," said the story-teller and old Two Strike sneered.

It was when the grass was at its best that the Sioux started for the country of the Pawnee. The teller of the tale made no secret of the intention of the Sioux to exterminate the Pawnees, sparing neither woman or children if the chance of their killing presented itself.

Two Strike and his Sioux reached the edge of the buffalo country and there they waited opportunity. They did not have to wait long. Runners told them that the Pawnees in full strength had started on a great hunting expedition led by Sky Chief, a noted warrior. When the name of Sky Chief fell from the lips of the interpreter old Two Strike smiled and closed his fist. The Sioux left their encampment and struck into the heart of the hunting country. There a scout told them that the enemy was encamped in a prairie gulch and that their women and children were with them to care for the hides and for the drying of the meat of the buffalo.

Two Strike led his men by "a way around," as the interpreter put it, coming finally to a point less than half a sun's distance from the camp in the valley. The Sioux struck a small herd of buffalo and they goaded the animals before them right up to the mouth of the gulch. When the buffalo were headed straight into the valley the Sioux pricked the hindmost with arrows and the herd went headlong toward the encampment of the Pawnees, who "were foolish men" and did not watch for an enemy.

When the Pawnees saw the buffalo they mounted their ponies and followed them out through the far end of the valley to the level plain leaving the women and children behind.

Then the Sioux went into the slaughter, sparing neither infancy nor age, and they had almost ended the killing when the Pawnee braves returned.

Then followed the last great battle which has been fought on the plains between tribes of red men. The storyteller in the tepee at Pine Ridge did not say so, but it is known from the account of a white man, Adabel Ellis, who knew the circumstances, that the Pawnees fought that day as they as they had always fought, bravely and to the death.

Sky Chief, the Pawnee, rode out in front of his men, shook his hand and called out that Two Strike, the Dakota, was a coward. Then Two Strike called back that the Pawnee was a dog's whelp and he rode out, armed with his knife, which was the only weapon Sky Chief held.

The two leaders met and fought. They dismounted turned their ponies loose and grappled. The story-teller lingered not on the details of the fight. He said simply "the Pawnees heard Sky Chief's death cry."

The tale ended. Two Strike rose, bared his right arm, drove his hand downward and then upward, and smiled.

Presuming Engraver Puts Initials on Pennies.

Washington, Aug 5—Like all newcomers in the critical gaze of the public, the new Lincoln penny which has been in circulation only one day, has already found its enemies.

Heralded all over the country as the substitute of the old "cigar stand Indian" coin, and sought in all the money centers as a curiousity, the new penny bids fair to become of even more value than was at first supposed.

The trouble is this. A man by the name of Victor D. Brenner, of New York, designed the penny. Somehow or other Mr. Brenner's initials appear in small raised letters on his work.

The letters "V. D. B." are on the coin near the edge, on the reverse side just below the sheafs of wheat. They can be seen with the naked eye if one's attention is directed to them closely.

There they are. There is nothing else they can stand for, so far as those who know anything about the design of United States coins can see. They must belong to Victor D. Brenner, and what right—ask the objectors—has Victor D Brenner to set his name on the exchange of the realm along with the likeness of the illustrious Abraham Lincoln? Victor D. Brenner, they admit, may be all right, but he is slightly misplaced that's all.

And so the question is going to be called to the attention of the director of the mint, and he will be asked to pass on the matter. He will be asked to say, in his official capacity, whether or not the designer of a coin is to be allowed to set his initials on the metal, to be circulated broadcast over the country wherever the coin itself permeates.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

D. M. DIXON.
Oakland, Md., July 29, 1909.

SINCE the action of the State Convention and the powers that be in the State Democracy, it is up to the Journal to make another slate for Garrett county appointments.

REPUBLICANS' CHANCE NOW.

The indications are that the coming campaign in this State will be an unusually interesting one. Questions of vital importance will be up for settlement and the public is giving indications of a keen interest in them. Before November every issue will be thoroughly understood, the voters will know what they want and will understand who and what the candidates represent.

The opportunity presented to the Republican party to demonstrate that the State needs a minority party strong enough occasionally to take the reins of government is most unusual. The life of the party in this State depends upon the defeat of the disfranchising amendment. Its strongest appeal to the independent voter to help defeat the amendment is: "You need an opposition party to protect you from misgovernment at the hands of an unchecked majority."

The time when the independent voters feels that he may want this protection is here and now. What is the Republican party going to do about it? An ounce of performance is worth a pound of promise. Every consideration prompts the party to prove its worth now by putting up candidates for the Legislature a good porportion of whom, at least, it can point to as evidence of the fact that it can be counted upon to rise to the occasion.

If the leaders have not the gumption to play good politics at a time like this by putting up the strongest and most capable men the party will not deserve success. Our opportunity is here, and we must take advantage of it.

STATE DEMOCRACY AND TAMMANY

The New York Tribune, referring to ex-Governor Warfield's speech, in which he says that the Democratic leaders of this state are "animated by selfishness" and in many cases are "controlled by the lawless element," compares the Democratic party of Maryland to New York's corrupt Democratic organization, Tammany Hall, and remarks that the Tammany Tiger must have strayed far beyond the Hudson into the State of Maryland.

There is much that New Yorkers do not know about the magnificent sweep of domination that is sought by the organization that down here answers in a modest way to the federation of political sachems in the regions of Father Knickerbocker, says the Baltimore American. From the time of that first eminent and adroit practical politician, versed in the use of an organization for the promotion of the ambitious, Martin Van Buren, to the present time, New York has not been without a political machine trained to every act and artifice. Tammany Hall, the ancient wigwam of Democratic braves, knows more about the control of elections than any other political body the world over. But down here in Maryland has been played the game with as much lack of principle and with as much determined purpose, even if lacking some of the spectacular impressiveness of the New York camp.

Under the old regime the Maryland cohorts of political corruption were popularly known as the bourbon Democracy. There remains some of the leaven. The succint arraignment by former Governor Warfield of his party clansmen of the bourbon stripe, gives a touch of realism to the existing ring and causes a New York contemporary to ask if the Tiger has migrated to Maryland. Party rule here has never needed the Tiger or sought to domicile him. It has always been able to rend and tear the political institutions of the state in more polite ways than by means of talons. The gentlemanly political thugs who once reigned supreme were as smooth as velvet and as soft as silk. If there are any of this class remaining it will be interesting to see them take shape under the caustic descriptions of Mr. Warfield.

Yet in Maryland there is a desperate effort at party entrenchment that would reduce the efforts of Tammany to keep control to the plane of amateurish performances. The gentlemen of the bourbon persuasion in Maryland seek by soft and sinuous means to convince the people that the offices are too important to be allowed to pass out their hands. Therefore, they would clamp themselves to the salaries with the bands of disfranchisement. Whatever may be the views of Mr. Warfield as to his party associates, the people generally will regard them as controlled by a lawless element to the extent they seek to pervert the election laws and the constitution to party preferment. The people will regard the Democratic party as animated by selfishness to the extent it is impervious to public opinion. This will be to a large extent, as the bourboun characteristic is indifferent to the decent sentiment ot the masses of the community. No, the Maryland's stand-and-deliver politicians do not need the Tiger so long as they have that gentlemanly prince of the political highways, the bourbon Democrat.

DO YOU WANT THIS?

Virginia passed a disfranchisement act aimed at the negro, but it has disfranchised as many whites as it has blacks, so that the actual vote of Virginia is now less than 150,000. Last year in the presidential contest it was less than 135,000. And that is not the worst. Virginia has a total population of about 2,000,000 and a voting population of about 400,000.

Last week Virginia held a Democratic primary for the nomination of a governor. It was the hottest election contest Virginia has had for many years. This primary is considered by the Democrats to be in reality the election of the next governor.

How many votes do you think were polled in this hot fight? Less than 60,000, of which the successful man got about 35,000.

So here you are. In a great state, with 400,000 men of voting age, 35,000 decide the issues, and in years when the interest is not warm, one half of that number will be the whole thing. What a lovely way of perpetuating political machines.

Who would like Maryland's 250,000 votes reduced to less than 25,000?

In a statement issued by a number of well known independent Maryland Democrats announcing their intention to oppose the disfranchising amendment it is said among other things, "It is not our purpose at the present time to discuss in detail the proposed amendment." Notwithstanding this disclaimer, we doubt if a stronger indictment of the amendment could be framed than that contained in this brief declaration of principles, which gives these reasons for opposing it:

Because the amendment has been framed by a body of intense partisans, seeking chiefly the perpetuation of their power as officeholders.

It cannot be shown that the present law of Maryland permitting all men to vote, except those convicted of crime, has been a disadvantage to our State.

It is untrue to say that there is any danger of negro domination in Maryland, for the negro population is less than 18 per cent. of the whole, and this proportion is constantly decreasing.

We object to a perpetual privileged class created by the "grandfather clause." It is un-American.

Finally, we oppose the amendment because we believe it to be directly contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land, in Maryland as well as elsewhere.

What more is needed? It is possible to give more reasons for objecting to the amendment, but it would be difficult to give better ones.

THE MINISTER AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Nettled by the frequent pulpit criticisms of the local press, the Canton, Ohio, Morning News has invited the Rev. E. O. Buxton, present pastor of President McKinley's old church, to edit the paper for a day. It feels that a man who knows so much about editorial work as the reverend gentleman assumes to know, ought not to hide his light under a bushel, but should give the world the benefit of his knowledge.

It is to be hoped that the minister will decline, for the offer is not as fair as it sounds to the layman. Even if Mr. Buxton had the advantage of years of training in a newspaper office he could not "make good" as managing editor of a strange newspaper in a day; for he would have to deal with a thousand matters in which knowledge of physical equipment and customs peculiar to the newspaper is required.

If, as it is to be assumed, the pastor is not a practical journalist, refusal is still more the part of wisdom. Nor need he use the language of "crawfishing," for no apology would be necessary. Any intelligent reader can tell whether a newspaper is good or poor, even if he doesn't know a "hell-box" from an "em quad;" just as millions of men who cannot speak ten consecutive intelligent sentences before an audience can pass intelligent judgment upon a sermon. We can tell whether another man knows his business without knowing it ourselves. We fancy the editor of the Canton paper would fail as dismally in Mr. Buxton's pulpit as Mr. Buxton probably would fail in the editor's chair; but that would be no reflection upon the editor's intelligence. Every man to his trade.

THE GRAVE SIDE OF THE SUMMER SEASON.

It is seldom that anyone perishes of cold in winter, at least in a city; indeed, such an occurrence would excite widespread comment, and there would be wonder why the charity organizations had not exerted themselves to discover such a case of suffering, or why the authorities, through the police, had not been more vigilant. The cold is sometimes bitter in the extreme; yet there is always shelter and protection somewhere for the most exposed.

Death from the weather in summer, however, is a very common thing. The list of fatalities from sunstroke, overexertion and similar direct causes is duly recorded; but there is a list—much longer, and probably very long indeed, but not printed in detail—of those who have succumbed from the indirect effects of a high temperature—the people sick already, the aged, weakened by their years, and the children, especially the babies. The suffering in the crowded districts, the tenement-houses, where humanity finds a habitation in smothering rooms, and in the congested lanes and alleys is intense. A daylight walk through these places does not disclose the sad sights within many of the houses; the exterior, though often squalid, may be rather cheerful.

The summer, which is so bright and beautiful, so far as nature is concerned, is really in some particulars a much more melancholy period than winter. The many funerals daily winding through the sunlit streets mutely reveal painful stories of suffering and bereavement, out of keeping with the gay outward appearance of the world. Thousands, it is true, are holiday-making in the mountains or at the seaside, where bands are playing and the dancing floors and piers at night are crowded; but there are other thousands who see nothing of this who know it not except from report—but who are toiling in hot rooms and without real rest in day or darkness.

The "good old summer-time" is, therefore, not good for all. Happily, benevolence is not unmindful of the lowly; in the big cities, such as our own, there are means provided by which refreshment, pure air and glimpses of the countryside and even of the blue water may be obtained at no great cost. There are the free excursion, the fresh-air outings and similar arrangements, to say nothing of the parks and squares, open to all. Winter appears sadder than summer because of its darker outward aspect; but summer, with all its sunshine and green, has its melancholy side as well.—Baltimore News.

ROCK BEING DELIVERED

Two to Three Car Loads Received Daily for New Road.

The State Road Commission, since condemning the first car load of limestone received here for the new state road leading north from Oakland, has passed upon and accepted the stone quarried at a point near Harper's Ferry, and since last Friday a number of car loads have been received here, the receipts averaging about two cars daily, which is being transported to the new road by the contractor in specially constructed wagons drawn by traction engines.

Five of these wagons loaded to full capacity are drawn by each engine and it is no uncommon sight to see the trains passing over the streets almost hourly. The stone being used is dark blue in appearance and is uniform in size. It is considered by the contractors as of exceptional quality for the purpose.

Marshall Field died worth over $100,000,000. He was a merchant who sold the same goods that can be found upon the shelves of our merchants. His name is known in every civilized land and in every community where Chicago is known. When he began business he was known only in his city square. Persistent, intelligent advertising made his name a fortune.

Although Miss Hyatt is familiar with the Rockies she is perfectly delighted with the scenery of Garrett county.

Mr. J. E. Bush has purchased the plumbing business established in Oakland a short time ago by M. J. Tierney, of Piedmont, W. Va., and will continue the business in the Nally building opposite the postoffice, under the name of J. E. Bush & Co. In connection with the water and gas fitting Mr. Bush will carry a line of gas heaters and ranges, his stock now being on its way here from the factories.

The newspapers of a town are expected to represent the town to the outside world, and to do this creditably they should carry in their advertising columns the name of every business house in the town. The stranger who picks up the paper and sees but one or two advertisements of local firms in its columns naturally supposes that is the extent of its business enterprises and hence will steer clear of so small a place. The newspapers may howl themselves hoarse about the great vim, energy and enterprises of their town, but unless it is supported by the testimony of local advertising the world will be slow to accept their statements.

Mr. William B. Sweet, of Swanton, in company with Hon. Geo. L. Micheals, of near Westernport, came up to Oakland yesterday morning where the deal was closed transferring the real estate and mercantile business of the late William W. Sweet, of Swanton, to the Westernport Mercantile Company, of Allegany county, of which concern Mr. C. S. Repp, of Westernport, is the president, and Mr. Micheals is secretary and treasurer. The business at Swanton will be conducted under the corporate name of its purchasers with Mr. Repp as the resident manager. Mr. Micheals will have a supervising interest in the concern as he now has in the home corporation. Notice advertisement of the company in another column of this paper today.

Monday afternoon Messrs. C. A. Deffinbaugh, Ed. A. Browning, ex-Senator R. T. Browning and Dr. E. H. EDITORIAL AMENITIES

What Grafton Editors Think of Each Other.

The Grafton Sentinel has the following: "Of all the filthy utterances that have ever come to the notice of the Sentinel, the one which appeared in the Republican of Saturday evening editorially in dubbing of the Sentinel with the new names to add to the long list of titles the Republican editor has given this paper, was the worst. It is far too filthy to reproduce in the columns of this paper, which would not contaminate the many homes of Grafton to which the Sentinel is a daily visitor, otherwise it would have space in these columns, that the people of Grafton might judge the calibre of the Republican editor. Fortunately for the morals of this community the Republican circulation is small and insignificant, otherwise that paper might undo the work of the Sunday schools and other institutions calculated to elevate the minds of the youths of Grafton, as well as the elders. Such filth, spread about by the insignificant ass that poses as the Reublican editor, who drinks in the dark and prays in the daylight, is an insult to the press of West Virginia.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. ELIZA FORTUNE HAGERMAN.

Mrs. Eliza Fortune Hagerman, the last of the Fortune family, one of Pittsburg's most prominent families of the last century, passed away Saturday evening at 9.30 o'clock at the home of her daughter, Mrs. James F. Grimes, 320 Charles street, Knoxville. Mrs. Hagerman was in her 84th year, and, although she retained all her faculties and seemed in good health until recently, she had been troubled at intervals with heart ailment, which caused her death.

Mrs. Hagerman was born in Zanesville, O., December 23, 1823, and came to Pittsburg with her family, which was afterwards one of the city's most successful and most prominent, when a girl. During her youth and afterwards she was one of the city's best known women in the social set, and she was also identified with many of the first movements inaugurated for the betterment of the city and the extension of the temperance cause.

Mrs. Hagerman was one of the first and one of the most active workers in a famous and historical orginization known as the Woman's Christian Alliance, and she was also a charter member of the local Women's Christian Temperance union. George Fortune, a brother of Mrs. Hagerman, who has been dead for some time, was at one time recognized as one of Pittsburg's foremost business men and influential citizens.

Mrs. Hagerman is survived by only two direct descendants, a daughter, Mrs. Grimes, and a son Mr. Richard Hagerman, also a resident of Pittsburg. She is also survived by eight grandchildren and two great-granchildren, before her death there being four living generations of the family. The eldest of the granchildren is former Assistant District Attorney W. D. Grimes and and the others are R. R., Miss Helen, James, Miss Zillah, John, Miss Frances and Miss Josephine Grimes.—Pittsburg Times.

HARRY IRVIN.

Harry Irvin, aged sixty years, an engineer in the employ of Mr. J. E. Francis, died at the Home Sanatorium in Oakland last night of hemorrhages of the brain. Recently Mr. Irvin underwent an operation involving the removal of his right eye, since which time he has been a patient at the sanatorium. His home was at Warren, Pa., and he leaves surviving him his wife and daughter. His funeral will occur in Oakland tomorrow.

From New York to Deer Park.

Nathalie Wells Boardman is scarcely nine years of age. Her home is in Englewood, Bergen county, New Jersey. When she was seven her parents spent the summer at Uplands, Deer Park, and remembering the good time she had, she told her mother she would not be afraid to travel alone if she could only have a chance. This opportunity was given her last Saturday. At five o'clock she was ready to start, although the first Erie train into New York left at 6.30. Her parents escorted her across New York to the foot of Liberty street for train No. 3 of the great B. & O., leaving at eight. Now she is at Uplands having a good time.

Mr. Nock in Deer Park.

State Superintendent Geo. H. Nock, of the Maryland Evangelistic Association, will visit Garrett county this week. On Saturday he will be in Oakland the greater part of the day. Saturday night he will lecture in Deer Park Union church, subject, "How to Keep Jack, the Boy, from Becoming a Jack of a Man." There will be no charge for admission, but the offering will go to aid the cause which the speaker represents. This is said to be a spicy lecture and at the same time instructive and helpful.

Mr. Nock will spend Sunday at Deer Park and will hold a service at 3 p. m. in the M. E. church. As a part of this service will be devoted to the children it is requested that a special effort be made to have all the children present.

FOR GREAT ROAD SYSTEM

The Maynard Bill Proposes Seven National Highways.

The good roads movement will be brought to the front in Congress next winter and an important step in this direction was taken July 31 when Represenative Harry Maynard, of Virginia, introduced a bill to authorize a preliminary federal survey to determine the approximate cost of a series of national highways. The bill asks a total appropriation of $1,999,899, and provides for a commission to conduct the survey.

The bill has the backing of Senators Daniel and Martin, of Virginia, and many others in each house. The principal highway for which the survey is asked is to be known as the "Washington National Highway" and is to begin at Washington and proceed by the most direct route practicable via the corporate limits of Baltimore, Wilmington, Philadelphia, Trenton, New York, Hartford, Boston, Concord and on to Portland, Maine. The other proposed highways to be surveyed are:

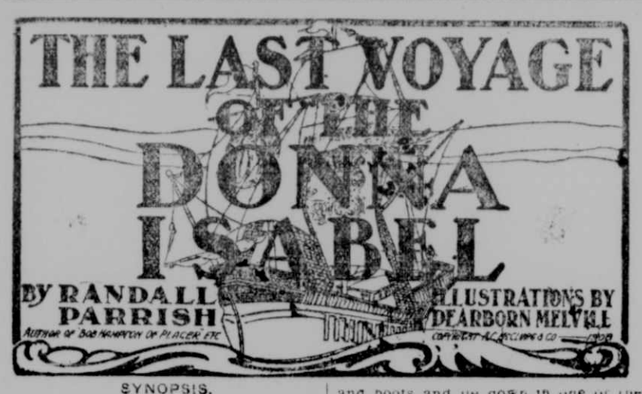
Roosevelt National Highway—Beginning at Washington by the most practicable route via Gettysburg and Harrisburg to Buffalo and Niagara Falls.

Lincoln National Highway—Beginning at Washington and by the most direct route to Seattle, Washington, passing through Maryland (via Sharpsburg), West Virginia, (via Columbus), Indiana and Illinois to Chicago, and extending on through Madison, Wisconsin, and Minnesota to St. Paul and Minneapolis, thence through Minnesota, South Dakota, North Dakota, Montana, Idaho and Washington to Seattle.

Jefferson National Highway—Beginning at Washington and thence to San Francisco passing through Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, to St. Louis thence through Utah and Nevada to California.

Grant National Highway—Beginning at Washington and thence to San Diego, California, via Virginia, West Virginia, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California.

Monroe National Highway—Beginning at Washington and thence to New Orleans and Austin, Texas, through Lynchburg, Va., North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana to New Orleans and Texas.



Lee National Highway—Beginning at Washington and thence through Richmond, Wilmington, N. C., Charleston, Savannah thence through Georgia and Florida to Jacksonville and Miami.

Thus seven great national highways are proposed by the bill, all of them to radiate from Washington and three of the seven to pass across Maryland.

The Constitution authorizes Congress to establish post roads, and in conformity with that grant of power, Congress in the earlier days built roads in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Montana, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, New Mexico, Nevada, Ohio, Oregon, Washington, Wisconsin, Colorado, Virginia and New York, costing $19,000,000. Congress also constructed the old National road extending from Cumberland, Marylapd, through Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, at a cost of $6,600,000.

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man imprisoned by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda, through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.—He entered the cabin and discovered the English woman and her maid.

CHAPTER VIII. — Stephens quickly learned the wrong vessel had been captured. Lord Darlington's private yacht, the lord's wife and maid being aboard. He explained the situation to her ladyship.

CHAPTER IX.—Then First Mate Tuttle told bare the plot, saying that the Sea Queen had been taken in order to go to the Antarctic circle.

CHAPTER X.—Tuttle explained that on a former voyage he had learned that the Donna Isabel was lost in 1753. He had found it frozen in a huge case of ice on an island and contained much gold.

CHAPTER XI.—Stephens, however, consented to be captain of the expedition. He told Lady Darlington. She was greatly alarmed, but expressed confidence in him.

CHAPTER XII.—The Sea Queen encountered a vessel in the fog. Stephens attempted to communicate, which caused a fierce struggle and he was overcome. Tuttle finally squaring the situation. Then the Sea Queen headed south again.

CHAPTER XIII.—Under Tuttle's guidance the vessel made progress toward its goal.

CHAPTER XIV.—De Nova, the mate, told Stephens that he believed Tuttle, now acting as skipper, insane because of his queer actions.

CHAPTER XV.—Stephens was awakened by crashing of glass. He saw Tuttle in the grip of a spasm of religious mania and overcame him. The sailor upon regaining his senses was taken ill.

CHAPTER XVI.—Tuttle committed suicide by shooting. Upon vote of the crew Stephens assumed the leadership and the men decided to continue the treasure hunt, the islands being supposed to be only 20 miles distant.

CHAPTER XVII.—Tuttle was buried in the sea, Lady Darlington pronouncing the service. Stephens awaking from sleep saw the ghost supposed to have formed the basis for Tuttle's religious mania.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Upon advice of Lady Darlington, Stephens started to probe the ghost. He came upon Lieut. Sanchez, the drunken officer he had humbled in Chile. He found that at Sanchez' inspiration. Engineer McKnight played "ghost" to scare the men into giving up the quest.

CHAPTER XIX.—Stephens announced that the Sea Queen was at the spot where Tuttle's quest was supposed to be. The crew was anxious to go on in further search. De Nova and Stephens conquered them. In a fist fight. Lady Darlington thanked him.

CHAPTER XX.—The Sea Queen started northward. She was wrecked in a fog. Stephens, De Nova, Lady Darlington and her maid being among those to set out in a life boat.

CHAPTER XXI.—Ten were rescued. Stephens saw only one chance in a thousand for life. Lady Darlington confessed her love to Stephens and he did likewise.

CHAPTER XXII.—Lady Darlington told her life story; how she had been bartered for a title, her yearning for absent love. She revealed herself as the school chum of Stephens' sister. She expressed a wish to die in the sea rather than face her former friends and go back to the old life. A ship was sighted.

CHAPTER XXIII.—The craft proved to be a derelict. They boarded her. She was frozen tight with hundreds of years of ice. Stephens found frozen bodies.

CHAPTER XXIV.—They accomplished the gruesome task of cleaning the cabin of the frozen bodies and rendering it fit for habitation. The vessel was the Donna Isabel, lost in 1753, 126 years previous.

CHAPTER XXV.—They read the log of the Isabel, which told how the Spaniards had died from cold, one by one. Lady Darlington sang to prevent the men from becoming moody.

CHAPTER XXVI.—The crew commenced the hunt for treasure. They found the iron chest, said to contain a part of 3,000,000 pesos, firmly imbedded in ice. Lady Darlington expressed the belief that it would never benefit the men, for she said the Donna Isabel would never reach port.

CHAPTER XXVII.—The men got a lust for gold. Stephens quelled it by whipping one. The Donna Isabel showed indications of sinking. They prepared to depart with what treasure had been found.

"Gone clear nutty," commented McKnight, tapping his head. "The very sight o' them yellow boys was too much for him."

"I only hope it wasn't my blow," I said soberly.

"Blow—hell! Why, that crack never hurt his skull, Mr. Stephens. The fellow was plumb crazy as soon as the box was open. He never thought there was so much money in the world. Why, you ought to 'a' heard him tell of the junk he was goin' to buy when he got his share back to the States. Oh, he'll come out of his dream all right if we only let him alone for a day or so."

So we left him down there alone, pegging away in the dark. He came up, however, at the call for dinner, eating away heartily without uttering a word and going back to his solitary labor, paying not the slightest heed to any of us. When night came I compelled him to remove his icy trousers and boots and tie down in one of the bunks. When I looked in a few minutes later he was sound asleep.

That the wreck was slowly settling down under us was beyond doubt, and laden with ice as she was the sodden hull would probably drop at last like a stone. The thickening sky to the southward made me exceedingly anxious; and just before dark we talked the conditions over together, each man having his say. The decision was to remain on board, all alike believing the Donna Isabel would keep afloat several days yet, unless the weather became serious. Everything was made ready, however, for a hasty escape, and a deck-watch set.

Doris passed the greater part of my watch on deck with me, and as Kelly was on the poop we were the nearest to being alone together we had ever been. It was an exceedingly dark night, but still an awful sense of loneliness brooding over the black waters, the canvas forward flapping mournfully, the huge rudder continually creaking to the slap of the waves, and a faint gurgle of water sounding from below. The dreariness of it affected us both, in spite of an effort at cheerfulness; besides, we had little to talk about except our perilous situation. Yet there was an acute pleasure in thus being together, and so she lingered on beside me, her eyes wandering from my face out into the gloom, much of the time silent, yet content. Finally, after urging her to go in out of the chill, I took a turn forward, even clambering up the ice hummock to the fore peak, and testing the rise of water with a measuring rod. As I returned aft, where Kelly was slapping himself to keep warm, a light flaky snow began falling and soon powdered the decks.

I did not undress, but flung myself on the couch in the main cabin after replenishing the fire, and lay there some time, staring up at the smoky deck-beams, listening to the slush of water in the lazarette, half-frightened by the soddenness of the hulk's rolling. Yet my conviction that she would keep afloat for hours yet finally lulled me to sleep.

De Nova woke me with a fierce grip on the shoulder, and I started up, noting the gray dawn on the front windows, and reading the truth in his face before he uttered a word.

"Is she going?"

"Oui, Oui; by gar, she sink quick!"

"Call all hands; get the boat clear and ready to swing. I'll bring the women."

The men were tumbling out as I pounded on the after state-room door. A glance through the stern-ports brought my heart into my throat, the crests of the pursuing waves were so close. Knowing that both women would be fully dressed, I flung open the door and began hastily gathering up their belongings. Within a brief minute we were outside on the deck. A single glance told us there was no time to waste. The sea ran somewhat heavier, yet with a regular swell, the Donna Isabel reeling and staggering like a drunken man. The vessel had sunk so deeply that her main-chains dipped, while her list permitted the water free entrance through the gap in the port bulwarks, and flooded the deck. There was a desperation to her mad wallowing which made me think each plunge would prove her last. I swung Doris into the stern of the longboat, bidding her hold tight.

"Now jump, men—lively, or she'll go down under us! De Nova, Johnson, tumble in and handle the ropes; Sanchez, fend off, and have an oar ready. Now, then, tail on the rest of you, and let her go—easy, there, easy! Slide down the line everybody, and cast off—oars, men, oars, or she'll swamp us."

With All My Strength I Flung Myself Forth—Straight Out Into the Sea.

The dip of the chains missed us by the barest inch; then we swung clear, tossed high on the creamy crest of a huge roller, which enabled us to look straight down on the sloping deck.

"Is every one here?" I asked.

"All but Jem Cole, sir."

"Cole, where is he?"

It was Johnson who answered.

"Well, all I know about it is, I hauled him out o' the bunk, and shook him wide awake. Then I left him to go out and rout out Kelly. That's the last I saw of him, sir, but it's a sure thing he ain't here."

De Nova had hold of the tiller, and I sprang forward, pushing past Sanchez, who was in the bow.

"Lay her nose close in where I can jump for the chains," I ordered sharply. "We can't leave Cole behind to drown."

It was a bit of a ticklish job the way the sea was running, and that lumping wreck sagging under, but the mate knew his trade, and, as the boat rose high on the swell, I leaped and hung on, my feet dangling in the froth. As the sodden hull swung reeling over I clambered up, and dropped to the deck. The missing negro was nowhere in sight. I leaned over, staring down at the bobbing boat being hurled back by the rebound of the surge, yet seeing only the white face of Doris upturned appealingly toward me.

"Pull out, boys; strong, now! Give her plenty of room so she won't suck you down when she drops. I've got to try the cabin."

I got aft that far. I even got fairly within the door, and my ears caught the dull, muffled sounds of blows between decks. My God! the fellow had actually gone back into that icy hold to dig for gold! As I stood there, trembling, wondering if I could dare the passage, I felt a sudden quiver of the deck, heard a sharp, ripping sound forward, a yell of mingled voices, and turned and ran for the rail. With all my strength I flung myself forth—straight out into the gray sea. I went down, down, down, feeling as if the very life was being sucked out of me, every muscle paralyzed by the icy coldness of the water. As I came up, gasping, struggling, scarce able to move a cramped limb, the suction caught me, dragging me back and down again. I battled against it like a madman, every instant an agony; and then, all at once, I found the crest and breathed in the welcome air, my stiffened limbs moving mechanically, my brain throbbing with pain. I could see nothing until a huge roller flung me upward, buffeting my face with icy spray, and there, below in the hollow, tossed the long-boat, every pallid face staring up at me. I saw them frantically back water, as the great surge hurled me down headlong. I was beside them; they clutched at me and missed. The stern, swung suddenly about by the blow of the sea, loomed over me, and then my fingers gripped a dripping oar-blade. God knows how I ever clung to it, wrenched by that sea—how the strength remained in my numbed hands; but some one twisted a boathook in the collar of my jacket, and so they hauled me, dripping and half-conscious, over the gunwale. I saw Doris. I looked into her eyes. I felt her bare hands on my wet cheek. I think it was the simple touch of her that gave me back life and comprehension of my condition. I endeavored weakly to lift my head, fighting against the awful numbness that held me prostrate. Everything seemed a dream, yet in that dream I heard De Nova's voice:

"Take him for'ard zare, dam' quick. Strip ze wet clothes off, or he freeze dead. By gar, jump you, Kelly, an' get blanket roun' him!"

I hardly know what they did, for I scarcely retained sufficient life to realize that I was still alive; but, when I was fairly warm beneath a pile of blankets, I saw Doris sitting where she could look down into my face, and the men busy stepping the mast and getting up sail. I pushed my hand out from under the covers and found hers.

"Don't cry, little girl," I whispered tenderly; "it is all right now."

She bent down, her cheek pressed against mine, unable to speak.

"Did—did the Donna Isabel go down?" I asked, after a moment's silence.

"Yes, and—and it nearly caught us," her voice sobbing, as the memory of it all came back. "I—I saw you jump, and then there was nothing—nothing but the sea. Oh! how did God ever save you—ever bring you back to me?"

I could only press her hand under the warmth of the blankets, still feeling it difficult to breathe.

"Did—did you see Cole?" she questioned at last, more calmly.

"No, but I heard him; he was down in the lazarette, chopping at the ice, poor devil."

I felt her shiver; then she lifted her head, looking forth over the sea.

"To the very end the dead are doomed to guard that gold," she said soberly. "I wish we had none of it aboard." I lay watching the delicate profile of her face, happy, yet with a little of foreboding.

"Lift me up a little, dear, until I can look about."

She did so with much gentleness, and I leaned against the gunwale. It was a raw, cloudy morning, sea and sky the same dull, dreary expanse of gray, with nothing anywhere to relieve the awful loneliness of water on which we tossed. Our eyes met and our handclasp tightened.

CHAPTER XXIX.

In Which We Fight Death.

I remember distinctly enough the first six days of that boat voyage; it seems as if every detail was burned upon my brain with fire. I see the faces of the men constantly becoming more haggard and hopeless as they stared, dull-eyed and aimlessly, out over the endless waste of water to the dun sky. We were so tired of it; it had grown so hateful in its pitiless vacancy, its dull, dreary void. It seemed to me that with every recurring dawn those within the boat appeared older, grayer, more deeply lined; their exposed flesh caked more heavily with the salt spray; their limbs cramped from confinement and cold; their eyes lusterless and heavy with despair. They conversed with some effort at cheerfulness at first, figuring on the speed with which we sailed, dividing up the treasure, counting the gold pieces, and speculating upon their probable value. But depression followed swiftly as day merged into day, with only that same desert of tumbling waters stretching about us, that same wild sky overhead. Finally the growling voices ceased entirely, the fellows becoming moody and sullen, scarcely answering even when addressed.

If anything the women managed to bear up better than the men, but whether this was because of their dispositions, or failure to comprehend fully the desperation of our situation, I am unable to say. Yet outwardly they seemed to retain courage longer. However, their eyes told me plainly enough how heavily the hours rested upon them. I saw comparatively little of Celeste, as she chose a position near the foot of the mast, and remained there much of the time, wrapped warmly in blankets, ministered to by De Nova, who sat beside her. But Doris remained aft with me, resting when I was off duty, but sitting wide awake, her head touching my knee whenever it was my trick at the tiller. It seems a strange thing to say, yet I believe it was the very certainty of death which kept her strong, self-reliant, almost happy. Not for one instant did she consider our final rescue as possible. She lived in her love for me, utterly insensible to the drear surroundings, and merely anxious to prolong our life together. It was a revelation to me of a woman's heart, a woman's constancy. May I never forget the clasp of her hand, the tender lovelight in her gray eyes, the words of faith and hope on her lips, as we sat thus through those long hours battling against the sea, the motionless forms of the blanketed sleepers alone evidencing other human life within the boat. It was her presence, her love, her inspiration, which stiffened me to the continued performance of a labor growing harder with each day.

It became easy to see what this meant to us all. It was neither hunger nor thirst, although I felt it safer to put all upon short rations from the beginning, but rather the awful, continuous strain of hopeless loneliness in that vast desert of ocean. The contemplation of it maddened us one moment into frenzy, and depressed us the next into profound melancholy. We could not shake it off; awake or in dreams it held us to slavery. Everywhere, everywhere the same eternal swell of the seas, the same eternity of clouded sky, the same dull, dead monotony of scene and motion, hour after hour, day after night. It drove us mad, crushing down upon the brain as though it was a real weight, merciless, agonizing. The air remained frosty, the southwest wind chilling, the spray which slapped into our faces icy cold. Our fingers stiffened with cold, our bodies shook from the chill; only beneath the warmth of the blankets could we find comparative comfort. Hour after hour the men lay, curled up and motionless, only crawling forth reluctantly to take their turn on watch. Our greatest effort was to keep the straining cordage free from ice, and to prevent its formation along the gunwale or at the bows, over which spray dashed in constant shower.

Good God, how those hours dragged, with the same heartless scene without, the same hopeless faces within! Most of us continued to live merely because we could not die. Indifference took the place of hope, and we performed our simple tasks automatically, almost unconsciously. Johnson, De Nova and I took our tricks at the helm, with one man always awake forward to manage the running gear, and only once during those first six days were we compelled to lower our sail or take a reef in the jib.

Then a fierce squall came tearing down upon us from out the northwest, a swift, sharp blow, heralded by a blinding snow flurry which kicked up an ugly sea, lashing us with heavier stinging spray, and coating everything with ice. For seven hours we fought in a blinding smother, every man awake, crouching beneath blankets, the women stowed away under the thwarts, and De Nova and I at the tiller, the huge surges pounding against our backs, as we thus kept them from sweeping the laboring boat fore and aft, and swamping her. I never believed we could weather it, the increasing waves tossing us about like a cork, yet, as the dawn broke, we succeeded in broaching to, with canvas drag holding her, and the very moment I realized she would ride safely I fell forward dead asleep. Either Doris or one of the men covered me with blankets, my icy clothing drying on my body. But it was Doris who welcomed me back to life again, as a little glimpse of westering sun grew barely visible through a rift in the dun clouds, with the mainsail again spread, and the longboat leaping to the foaming summits. Oh, but it was worth all suffering just to read the confession of her eyes, and to feel her bend down over me in sudden tenderness! I am not ashamed that the tears dimmed my eyes so I could scarcely see her dear face or that my voice choked so I could do no more than whisper her name. She must have understood, for her soft hands touched my cheek, and so we rested for a long time, scarcely exchanging a word between us.

It was later that same day, just at the edge of twilight, when Kelly called, "A sail!" pointing eagerly out over the port quarter. Then, some upon knees, some standing, we all saw it, a misty, white reflection, showing vague against the darkening horizon. I know not what it really was—a gleam of canvas, a speck of cloud, or the pinnacle of an iceberg—but as we swept toward it, the night dropped down over the waters blotting the last faint vestige from view. Yet we hung on desperately, the man staring out into the black void, grumbling and cursing, until the long night wore away with no reward.

That was about the last I recall clearly; afterwards all grew indistinct, commingled, confused. It was like a dream rather than reality. I performed my work as before, the instincts of a seaman leading me rightly, and out of the mist numerous incidents arise to memory proving that I observed and thought. Never can I forget the sight of that narrow boat, tossing about on the crests of great seas, or plunging down into the black hollows; the green water pouring in cataracts over the gunwale; the constant bailing; the wet, soggy blankets; the moaning of wind through the icy cordage; the flapping of the sail; the gray masses of water curling over us in continuous threatening; the awful expanse of ocean revealed by daylight; the black loneliness through which we swept at night. We ceased to talk, to think, even, growing more and more sullen, moody, dull-eyed, cramped of limb and benumbed of brain. We sat silently staring into the another, forever beholding the mirages of distorted minds. Men would spring to their feet, yelling out some discovery, only to sink back again, with ghastly faces hurled in their hands. It was all illusion; the waves, the clouds mocking us, even our voices sounding unnatural, our faces growing unfamiliar.

Only Doris; Doris did not change—not, at least, to my eyes. Ay, she became whiter, weaker, the shadows growing darker beneath her eyes, yet she still sat at my knee, looking up into my face, yielding me new courage out of her heart of hearts. God knows I believe she saved me, saved me from going mad, saved me with the power of her love—held me sane, held me steadfast, when the very soul in me had given way. I think of those other faces now with a shudder. It seems as if all that was human had gone out of us; we were no longer men, only things. We crawled about. We growled rather than used articulate speech, bruised by the constant buffeting of the sea, sore with the smart of salt water, chilled through by the icy wind, we snarled like wild beasts, our eyes bloodshot, our faces haggard and unclean.

I know not how long it endured. I lost all track of day and night. I merely remember this and that out of the mist, Doris' gray eyes ever upon me, her hand clasping mine; Celeste lying motionless day after day under the blankets; De Nova rocking back and forth, striving to sing, or creeping aft to the tiller, with his body shaking as though he had a palsy; Johnson, never moving, his head sunk into his chest, his gaze out over the bows; McKnight curled up as a dog lies, sometimes cursing fiercely, only to break off and cry like a child. I remember when the boom swung about, pitching Sanchez headlong and breaking his leg; how we pulled it back into position with a sickening snap, binding it there firmly, while beads of perspiration told the Chilean's pain. I recall that other day when Dade suddenly stood up, his eyes staring dully out into the fog-bank which wrapped us

Paul's Third Missionary Journey

Sunday School Lesson for August 15, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 18:23-19:22. Memory verses 19-20.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"The name of the Lord Jesus was magnified."—Acts 19:17.

TIME.—Paul began his third journey probably in A. D. 53, and it lasted three years, 53-56, or 57.

PLACE.—Paul ended his second journey by going to Jerusalem, and thence to Antioch. From there he went through Asia Minor, ending at Ephesus, the capital of the Roman province of Asia.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

How Paul Built Up the Religious Life of Ephesus.

Paul Enters Upon His Missionary Journey, and Strengthens the Older Churches.—Acts 18:22-23. When Paul had completed his second missionary journey he went up to Jerusalem to pay his respects to the mother church there, and doubtless, as at other times, he told the wondrous story of the work of God in bringing so many Gentiles into the kingdom. Here he would remain long enough to complete his vow, the apostle to the Gentiles in loving accord with the mother church.

Then he went down to the home church which had sent him forth. Here he was always welcome. Here he told the story of his missionary adventures, and the fruits of his labors. This is probably the last time Paul was able to visit Antioch. It is probable that while here Paul wrote the Epistle to the Galatins, on receiving the report of Timothy concerning the churches in that region, and not long afterward he himself went through the region of Galatia and Phrygia in order, strengthening the churches, for there was great need. (Gal. 1:6—12; 3:1-5; 5:1—12—15.)

Ephesus, which Paul made his headquarters for nearly three years of missionary work, was not only the capital of the province, but was the city of the greatest importance in all Asia Minor, and principal emporium of trade in the east.

Paul Finds an Undeveloped Church of Ephesus, and Brings Them Into the Fulness of the Gospel Light.—Acts 18:24—19:7. The Eloquent Apollos. When Paul left Corinth at the close of his second journey, his friends Aquila and Priscilla went with him as far as Ephesus. Before Paul entered upon his longer work at Ephesus there came a Christian Jew of great eloquence (v. 25) "knowing only the baptism of John; the gospel of repentance and forgiveness, and Christian morals, and of Jesus who proclaimed the kingdom of heaven at hand, and worked many miracles of love, and died on the cross, the story which was told in the earlier gospels.

These things Priscilla and Aquila expounded to him. Then he went to Greece (v. 27) and "helped them much which had believed through grace." Of this Paul once speaks in his letter to Corinth, "I planted, Apollos watered God gave the increase." (1 Cor. 3:6).

Paul's Preaching and Teaching.—Vs. 8-10. First. In the Jewish synagogue. Three months. To Jews. As usual, Paul began with the Jews who were best prepared to receive the Gospel. "And spake boldly." It required no little courage to take the unpopular side, which had so often brought him into trouble.

Second. In the school of Tyrannus. Two years. To Gentiles. "Disputing," discouraging, arguing, "daily" and not merely on the Sabbath, "in the school of one Tyrannus." Nothing is known positively about this man.

"Continued . . . two years," in addition to the three months in the synagogue. "All they which dwelt in Asia," the Roman province of Asia, of which Ephesus was the capital. "Heard the word." Paul had with him a number of helpers, as Timothy, Erastus, Titus, etc.

Two Kinds of Testimonials to the Power and Value of the Gospel.—Vs. 11-22. In addition to the holy conduct and noble spirit exhibited in the ordinary daily life there were two outward and visible testimonies to the truth and power of the Gospel. First. Miracles of healing and help. "God wrought special miracles." "By the hands of" the instrumentality of "Paul." In Ephesus, the center of magic and witchcraft, special power was given Paul to work miracles that conquered them in their own stronghold. He actually did what the sorcerers pretended to do.

Self-denial for the Cause of Christ. Doing right at great cost. "Many that believed came, and confessed" that they had been using magical practices, but now, realizing that they were wrong, "shewed their deeds" by publicly confessing and renouncing all such heathen practices, by which doubtless they had been making money.

"Many of them," referring to those who had been magicians previous to their conversion, "which used curious arts," such as magic, incantations, sleight of hand, charms, secret knowledge of chemistry, hypnotism, jugglery, and everything by which they had deceived the people.

These men and women were in the habit of carrying about on their persons as charms or amulets to shield them from danger and from harm, or to procure them good fortune in their undertakings. We read how Croesus, when on his funeral pile, repeated these "Ephesian spells."

Light from the Orient.—In the Vienna museum are some very old manuscripts, called the Fayum manuscripts, some of them dated 1,200 years B. C., discovered a few years ago in Egypt. Among them are large quantities of magical writings, with the Hebrew formulae.

When Polly Thrilled.

By GRACE MORTON.

The girl's hand lay quietly in the strong, brown palm.

"Is there no response in your heart?" queried the young fellow, tightening his clasp as he gazed into the brown eyes that gave him back the look of a troubled child.

"I am afraid not, Ned," answered the girl reluctantly; "not any more than there is there." She nodded her golden head toward the imprisoned fingers. "By all accepted rules I should feel a thrill at your touch if I loved you, and I don't—not a bit of a one."

Ned dropped the hand that did not "thrill" promptly and dug holes in the sand with his bare heel strenuously as he said, with a huge sigh, "You are absolutely heartless, I do believe, Polly."

"Not so," replied the girl, combing up some straying lovelocks and settling her bathing cap at a more bewitching angle. "I am only young and well satisfied with this good old world just as it is at present." And Polly nonchalantly plied the wet sand in a circle and watched an imprisoned sand jumper's ineffectual attempts at escape.

"That's just the way you've got me," remarked Ned gloomily as he gazed at the little creature.

"Nonsense!" answered Polly as with a long, flying leap the jumper got away.

HIS CHIN CAME DOWN SHARPLY ON THE RING.

"I couldn't keep him, you see"—and mischief twinkled in her eyes as she sprang to her feet—"but I'll promise you one thing, Ned"—Polly extended her firm white hand, full of sand, toward the young man—"if ever this does thrill I'll tell you first of any one. Come on and don't be so tragic. I'll race you to the raft once more."

Ned ducked just in time to escape the sand she aimed at him and stumbled after the flying figure in its trim black suit.

Polly was the best girl swimmer at the beach, and Ned had his work cut out for him. They landed at the raft side by side, to the delight of two half grown lads who were eagerly watching the race.

"You're a dandy, miss," said the younger boy admiringly as he extended his hand to help her on the raft with the freemasonry of bathers.

"My, but they are fierce today," panted Polly, grasping Ned's arm to keep from sliding as an extra big wave tilted the heavy raft at an alarming angle.

"We had better get back before the tide turns," said Ned. "There's bound to be a big undertow with such a sea on. As soon as you are rested, Polly, we had better start. What is it, Jim?" he asked as the boy drew near.

"Wish you'd show me friend," jerking his thumb at the heavy built lad of seventeen, "that double back dive I seen you do the other day," the boy said, with a grin parting his freckles.

"Sure thing," replied Ned obligingly. Jim was the lobster man's boy.

"It pays to stand in with the powers that be," murmured Polly. "Think of our lunches, Ned, and put on your best form."

Ned had a "corking physique," as the girl phrased it, and as he left the springboard, turning his two somersaults and cleaving the water neatly, Polly gloried in his muscular strength and beauty of line as she would in that of a thoroughbred horse.

"I feel the undertow. The tide has turned," said Ned as he came up sputtering at the corner of the raft. He caught hold of the big iron ring on the side of the wood to pull himself up just as a huge wave struck him fair and square between the shoulders. As it receded his chin came down sharply on the ring. In a flash the man disappeared like a plummet.

Polly gasped when no dark head reappeared. "Quick, quick!" she cried. "He is stunned. Oh, Ned!"

One agonized glance at the slender boy and the lout of a fisher lad showed her how much help they would be.

"Under the raft—the undertow. Oh, my God!" screamed the frantic girl. A band of ice seemed to be around her brow; then suddenly her wits were clear once more. Grabbing up the heavy safety rope, she tied it around her waist.

"Take it," she commanded the boys sharply, "and pull quick when I pull. I am going under the raft after him."

She slid down in the green depths. A few strokes to the left, and she was in the blank darkness under the raft. An instant's frantic clutching here and there—and then, thank God, she had the neck of Ned's bathing suit in her desperate grasp.

She pulled wildly on the rope, swimming and tugging at the same time. The boys answered her. The heavy edge of the raft scraped the girl cruelly as they tugged, and she had no strength to clear it, but she held the inert form tightly in a half unconscious grip.

Out at last! Oh, that blessed first gulp of air! Jim's cries had brought the life squad, and willing hands eased her of her burden, and as they lifted her into the boat Polly collapsed.

Everything was dreamlike after that until she found herself in bed in her room at the hotel. She dimly remembered being assured that Ned was all right, and she smiled faintly as Brother Bob said: "Cheer up. We have got a heroine in the family at last." Then she slept the sound sleep of exhaustion until the following afternoon.

"Best thing for her," said the doctor in answer to her mother's anxious inquiries. And so it proved. With the exception of a few bruises Polly was all right when she awoke, and after a meal served in her room she donned a most fetching pale pink gown that gave a becoming flush to her rather pale cheeks and sent for Bob.

"You look pretty fit, after all, sis," said Bob. "There is mischief brewing. I can tell by the glint in your eye."

"Nonsense," replied Polly. "Do something for me, there's a good boy. I want to see Ned, and I can't stand it to face all those people tonight. You might mention that I am going up to Pine cliff after dinner, but for goodness' sake don't let him know that I want him to come." The color rose clear to her pretty brown eyes as Bob began to grin.

"Now, be good," she coaxed, "and don't tease. I'll make you a dandy pillow if you will."

"It's a go," said Bob. "I'd rather fancy him for a brother-in-law," shutting the door just in time to escape Polly's powder puff.

After dusk Polly managed to escape unseen by the back door and made her way with beating heart to the cliff.

There was a cozy sheltered seat for two facing the ocean about halfway down the rocks, and there she found, as she expected, Ned awaiting her.

The moon's radiant pathway ended at the base of the cliff, and as Polly descended the path she looked like a fair goddess in her filmy gown to the young fellow who watched her with eager eyes.

When they met Polly was surprised to find herself incapable of speech. Ned grasped both her hands and gently kissed first one, then the other, without saying a word.

He must have felt a subtle difference in their touch, for after one quick look at the shrinking girl he knew—and, knowing, blessed the world and Polly.

After a long, long talk, interspersed with happy silences, Polly raised her face, illumined by the moon's soft sheen, and the brown eyes twinkled with their old teasing light as she laid her hand on Ned's and said softly, "I suppose I must keep my promise, Ned." Then the love light shone above the mischief as she added, "I really believe I felt a thrill."

The Fire Cure.

The belief is general throughout a large part of China that the insane are under the influence of evil spirits. In their endeavors to cure afflicted patients the Chinese doctors, so called, administer a medicine which produces violent and distressing vomiting with the idea of having the patient throw off the insanity. The proper care of the insane is almost unknown. It is a common custom, if a member of the household becomes unmanagable or troublesome, to chain him to a post or heavy stone in the house. Dr. Selden, a missionary physician in southern China, writing on the subject in the China Medical Missionary Journal, says that he recently saw a woman in Canton who had thus been chained about the neck for fifteen years. There is no intention of cruelty in this, but knowing nothing about the nature of the malady there is nothing else for friends to do. Frequently, in order to determine whether a person is really insane or only obstinate, a piece of wick soaked in oil is placed under the thumb nails and lighted, with the result that the thumbs are often badly burned.

What Is Old Age?

This is Walt Mason's story: A few days ago an aged man was planted in a little Kansas cemetery. That he was highly thought of was evidenced by the long cortege that followed the plumed hearse to the city of rest. Friends stood by the open grave and shed real tears, yet none of them would have called him back to life had that been possible, for he had died of old age and consequent infirmities. The toil and tribulations of seventy-five years had battered him down, and for a long time before his death he merely went through the motions of living.

"He was an old, old man," said the mourners as they turned away from the grave when the clods had been heaped upon the coffin lid.

"His age wasn't hurting him any," responded a querulous voice. It came from a white haired man who stood by the newly made grave leaning upon a stick. The speaker was the dead man's father. He was ninety-eight years old.

BOWSER SETS A TRAP

Holds Radical Views Concerning the Treatment of Burglars.

ROBBED WHILE HE SLEPT.

Armed to the Teeth, He Awakens to Find a Message of Thanks From a Visitor, Who Made Good His Escape From the House.

[Copyright, 1903, by T. C. McClure.]

WHEN Mr. Bowser reached home from the office the other evening Mrs. Bowser had some news for him. On the previous night burglars had entered no fewer than three houses on their block and carried off more or less swag, and thus far the detectives had secured no clew to the gentry. Some of the detectives had said that it was more than likely that the marauders would return to the street another night, and householders had been notified to be on the watch.

"And so we must be careful to see that doors and windows are fast before we go to bed tonight," added Mrs. Bowser as they descended to the dining room.

"We will do no such thing," replied Mr. Bowser. "On the contrary, I shall make it easy for a burglar to effect entrance. The situation is one that I have hoped for for months."

"You—you want a burglar in the he——"

"I order——ree or four of them, if they can on——ke it convenient. I have long be——isted with the action of the ci——made burglary cases. Instead of gi——the burglar caught the maximum penalty of the law, not one in twenty gets it. They are imprisoned for one, two or three years and come out to try it over again. We need a heroic and radical change in this matter."

WHEN HER SPINE RAISES ABOUT TWO FEET.

"But you are not a judge on the bench."

"No; I am simply a humble householder, but the radical change referred to may have its beginning right in this house."

"But how do you mean?" asked the puzzled Mrs. Bowser.

"I mean that burglars should not be left to the courts, but to the coroners. In other words, they should be killed on the spot. Householders should slaughter them right and left until the profession becomes extinct. Give them to understand that it is sure death to enter a house, and they may take off their coats and go to work at honest labor."

"Then you mean that you are going to try to kill a burglar tonight?"

"Yes, ma'am, I do. For the past three months I have been fairly longing for the situation that has developed at last. The fellows have held off for a long time, but they are here now, and we shall see what we shall see. If any marauder comes about this house tonight and does not meet with a surprise party, I shall have nothing further to say on the subject."

Mrs. Bowser wished to be informed of his plans, but he held her off for the next hour. Then dinner had been finished and he had gone all over the house inspecting doors and windows and nodding his head now and then in a sagacious manner. He even ascended to the garret and inspected the roof and then descended to the cellar and opened the doors of the furnace and peered within. Half a window pane had been broken out of a kitchen window, and he measured the hole with a tapeline and spent ten minutes figuring whether a man weighing 160 pounds could enter the house by it. He was still prowling around when the impatient Mrs. Bowser demanded:

Baits Trap For Marauder.

"Well, what does all this mean?"

"It means that I am seeing where best to bait the trap for a burglar," he replied. "You can't rush this thing like buying a pair of sixty cent stockings marked down to 59. I want to make a sure thing of it. There must be no escape for the burglar who enters this house tonight. His portion must be a riddled death. I have decided to station myself in the dining room and leave the outer door unlocked."

"That's all nonsense. You can hire a man to sit on the front steps all night."

"And that very man might be in league with a gang. Not any hiring for me. I shall do my own watching and my own killing. I want the burglary profession to know that it's Bowser who is after it. You will go to bed at the usual hour and go to sleep, and I shall quietly take up my watch. I may kill two or three burglars before you are aroused. In fact, there will not be the slightest need of your waking up. I have no weapons and am now going to start out and borrow some."

"But I wish you would give it up!" pleaded Mrs. Bowser. "I don't believe there is one chance in a hundred that a burglar will come, and you know what a poor hand you are to sit up and watch. Since you began to grow fat the loss of sleep breaks you all up."

That was an unfortunate remark. Mr. Bowser flushed up, looked hard at her and replied:

"Woman, this is not a subject for ridicule or prevarication. I have not gained an ounce of flesh in the last year. Even if I had gained a ton that would be no excuse for not protecting my own home from the ravages of a gang of evil disposed men. I shall proceed with my own plans, and I shall not need your advice in the least."

With that he walked down the hall and clapped on his hat and walked over to the butcher's. There he requested and secured the loan of a great knife. The butcher was busy and asked no questions. From there he went to the plumber's and borrowed a shotgun and buckshot cartridges, and at the drug store he was handed an old baseball bat, with the remark:

"That's right, Bowser. If you can kill off half a dozen of the cats in this neighborhood a dozen good cigars shall be waiting for you. The best way to kill a cat is to creep upon her and then wait until she sees another cat and begins to hump her back. When her spine raises about two feet then do you spit on your hands, draw a long breath and"—

Armed and Ready For Anything.

But the indignant burglar slayer didn't wait to hear any more. He left and walked into his house like a brigand searching for a victim, and Mrs. Bowser said to herself that he looked fierce enough to scare a schoolma'am off the fence. Although it was only 9 o'clock, he said to her:

"I want you to go to bed at once and turn out the light in the room as soon as possible. Burglars are no fools. They are not going to walk into a trap blindfolded."

"And you insist on sitting up alone?"

"I do, and I don't want you calling down to me either. I am after big game, and I don't want it frightened away by any woman's nonsense."

Mrs. Bowser went upstairs and took a seat by the window in the darkness, and Mr. Bowser took his arsenal down to the dining room and prepared for business. He opened the door, took a seat by the table and turned the gas down very low and began his vigil. At 10 o'clock the street was quiet. Half an hour later he caught himself nodding, and in order to keep awake he began wondering whether he should shoot the burglar down without an instant's warning or permit him to have three or four minutes' grace to prepare his hardened soul for the journey. By killing at once the newspapers would praise his promptness and dispatch; by a little delay his conscience could not accuse him of hustling a human being into the other world. He was debating this point when the light went out for him and he slept. The gun and the knife and the club winked at him through the darkness, but his eyes were closed. He might have slept an hour or a year, so far as he could tell, when he opened his eyes to see Mrs. Bowser confronting him and to hear her words:

"Well, Mr. Bowser, don't you want to come to bed?"

"Eh, eh? W-what you doing down here? I thought I told you to stay away."

"You, you did. Where are the gun and other weapons?"

Mr. Bowser sprang up and looked around him in the greatest surprise.

"And where is your watch?"

He felt for it, but it was missing.

"And the big solid silver pitcher that stood on the sideboard?"

It was no longer there.

"And this?" said Mrs. Bowser as she held up a bit of paper on which a message had been scrawled in pencil. The message read:

"Many thanks, old man. Ta-ta!"

Bowser's vigil was over.

BREEDING UP IS CHEAPEST.

No Money in Raising Scrub Stock—Get Pure-Bred Bull.

The farmer who intends to secure a herd of pure-bred cattle will find it cheaper to breed up than to buy pure-bred stock. This is especially true if he is preparing to raise cattle for the purpose of making beef. If he buys all pure-bred stock, the investment will be so heavy that he cannot afford to sell the progeny for the block, but will feel constrained to go into the business of raising breeding cattle, for which he may not have taste and adaptability.

Good females of pure-bred beef stock bring high prices and he would need a considerable number of pure-bred cows to make a good start. But with a pure-bred bull he can in a few years have a herd of cows that will make it possible to market beeves of high grade—market toppers. For the beef maker, then, this is about the only course possible.

In selecting a herd of cows for breeding up, the Indiana Farmer suggests that a man should try to get animals in keeping with the breed of the bull he intends to buy. Thus, if he is going to use a pure-bred Shorthorn bull, he should find cows having the general conformation of the Shorthorns. He will find it easy to secure good animals having in them considerable Shorthorn blood, though these animals would have to be regarded in his breeding operations as without any pure blood, simply because the buyer would not generally know how much Shorthorn blood such animals contained.

The same is true in the use of pure-bred bulls of any breed. If a man buys a Hereford bull he should hunt up cows having some of the general conformation of Herefords and use these for his breeding operations. If such animals cannot be secured in his own vicinity he can generally find them at the big stock markets and get them at meat prices. The breeding up process offers many advantages that the other process does not offer.

THE LIVE STOCK.

Hogs should be kept away from filthy water holes.

Wheat and barley mixed is a good feed for pigs.

Soaked grain gives better results than soaked meal.

Corn costs just about half what oats do as a fattening feed for hogs.

Rice meal and other by-products of rice can be profitably fed to hogs.

UNSUCCESSFUL DIAGNOSIS.

The man's cough grew worse, so he resorted to the physicians.

"From the stomach, I think," said Dr. Simtom.

"Pardon me, there is no such thing as a cough from the stomach," answered Dr. Modern.

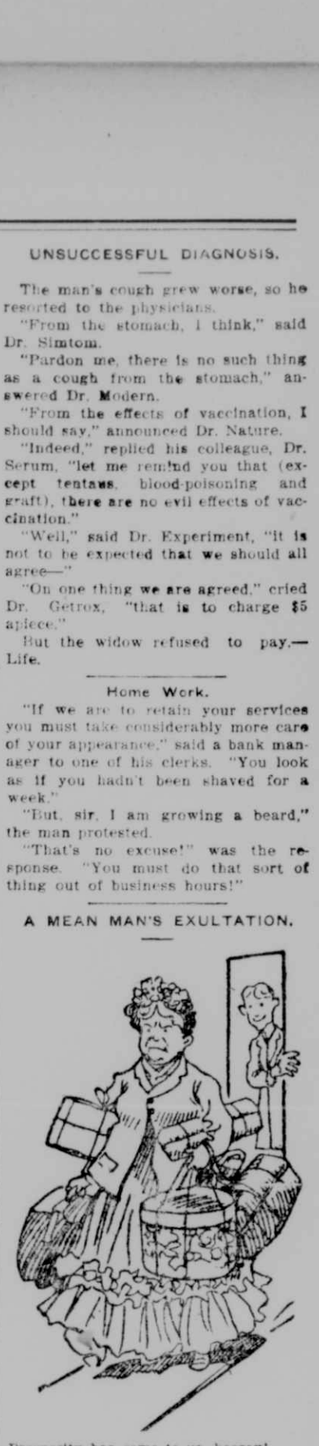
"From the effects of vaccination, I should say," announced Dr. Nature.

"Indeed," replied his colleague, Dr. Serum, "let me remind you that (except tentanus, blood-poisoning and graft), there are no evil effects of vaccination."

"Well," said Dr. Experiment, "it is not to be expected that we should all agree—"

"On one thing we are agreed," cried Dr. Getrox, "that is to charge $5 apiece."

But the widow refused to pay.—Life.



Home Work.

"If we are to retain your services you must take considerably more care of your appearance," said a bank manager to one of his clerks. "You look as if you hadn't been shaved for a week."

"But, sir, I am growing a beard," the man protested.

"That's no excuse!" was the response. "You must do that sort of thing out of business hours!"

A MEAN MAN'S EXULTATION.

Prosperity has come to us, hooray!
I'm so elated I can scarcely speak;
Last night the cook got mad and went away,
We had to pay her seven plunks a week.

GOOD ROADS CONFERENCE

People Are Becoming Interested In the Proposed Meeting.

The proposed good roads conference to be held at Mountain Lake Park under the joint auspices of the West Virginia and Maryland good roads advocates, promises to be well attended and will be interesting to all. Considerable interest is being manifested in the proposed meeting, especially on the part of our West Virginia neigbors.

"Commissioner of Roads Light," says a West Virginia newspaper, "is much interested in the coming meeting of good roads men at Mountain Lake Park, Md., August 28-30. Governor Glasscock, ex-Governor Dawson, Governor Crothers, of Maryland, a number of the officials of the department of agriculture of the government, and leading good roads men from various sections of the country are expected to be present. It is said the meeting will be the largest and most important ever held in this country, and it is the desire of Commissioner Light that as many of the road engineers and members of the county courts of West Virginia be present as possible. If the present plans are carried out, the states of West Virginia, Maryland and Pennsylvania will join in forming a tri-state organization. The program calls for an address from Governor Glasscock, ex-Governor Dawson, Commissioner Light, Governor Crothers and several of the men who have been prominent in the good roads movement throughout the country. Maryland has already started the betterment of its roads by an appropriation for good roads, extending from one end of the state to the other, and hopes to induce West Virginia and Pennsylvania to join with them in extending the movement.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, AUGUST 19, 1909. NUMBER 25

HON. A. H. BOYD NAMED AGAIN FOR CIRCUIT BENCH

Chief Judge is Unanimous Choice of Democrats.

CUMBERLAND, MD., AUG. 12.—The Fourth Circuit Democratic Judicial Convention, held this morning in the Academy of Music, renominated Andrew Hunter Boyd for chief judge by acclamation. The convention was called to order by DeWarren H. Reynolds, acting on behalf of the Democratic State Central Committe. Prior to the opening of the convention the delegates, decorated with white flannel badges surmounted by a small medallion portrait of Judge Boyd, marched from the office of Mr. Reynolds to the Academy of Music, more than 100 strong.

The officers of the convention were: Edward W. Mealy, of Washington county, chairman; Philip McMahon, of Allegany county, and J. L. McCrobie, of Garrett county, vice-chairmen; Charles N. Danzer, of Washington county, James P. Gaffney, of Allegany county and C. M. Miller, of Garrett county, secretaries.

Gen. Joseph Sprigg, of Allegany county, Gilmor S. Hamill, of Garrett county and Col. Charles A. Little, of Washington county reported resolutions eulogizing Chief Judge Boyd and his work as the head of the circuit bench and that of the Court of Appeals, which were adopted.

Former Judge Ferdinand Williams of Cumberland made the principal nominating speech. Gilmor S. Hamill of Garrett county, in seconding the nomination, said the bar of Garrett county, irrespective of political affiliation, has announced its intention of supporting Judge Boyd for re-election. He said that petitions from Baltimore and from counties throughout the state asking this circuit to return Judge Boyd as Chief Judge of the Court of Appeals. Ex-Judge W. J. Witzenbacher seconded the nomination on behalf of Washington county.

Good Homes Desired.

J. Ed. Kildow, humane officer at Elkins, W. Va., desires to secure good homes for a number of children now in the Children's Home in his city. Ages run from two to 12 years. These children will be placed only in good homes as members of the family, and not as servants. A rigid investigation of the homes applying for children will be made before a child is placed, and only good homes accepted.

Applications must be made upon blanks furnished by Mr. Kildow upon request. Those desiring children should write to Mr. Kildow at Elkins, W. Va.

POLITICAL METHODS URGED IN CHURCHES

Workers In Sunday-Schools Bidden To Study Them.

In the Lutheran Church at Deer Park Sunday, Superintendent George H. Nock of the Maryland Evangelistic Association, delivered an address on Sunday-school work. Among other things, he said:

"A political campaign is on us, and we have excellent opportunities to watch the methods of politicians, and as Sunday-school workers we can do so with profit. The master said: 'The children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light.' We do not desire to be understood that all politicians are altogether 'children of this world'—that is, self-seekers and corrupt manipulators. Not at all. There are men whose political activities are the result of deep interest in their county, State or country; but they are, I regret to say, in the minority.

"But from the politicians as a class we can learn some lessons, and they are these:

"First—They are deeply interested and intensely desirous of success.

"Second—They keep themselves informed about political matters; they read and think and plan much.

"Third—They are energetic and persevering, and make any sacrifice to secure influence or votes. They don't mind spending money to get results.

"Fourth—They believe in personal effort and do not rely altogether on public meetings and other demonstrations, but go into the homes, the workshops, into the fields, and hail men on the streets or public roads to talk up the issues of the campaign.

"If we employed like methods as Sunday school workers the work in this State would not be in its present unsatisfactory condition. If the Bible is worth as much as we claim, let us teach its truths diligently to the children, not forgetting to study it ourselves.

"If character is worth as much as we claim, let us seek prayerfully to mold characters of strength and beauty in our children, 'that our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as cornerstones, polished after the similitude of a palace.' If a soul is worth as much as we claim, let us be wise to win it for God and Heaven."

Republicans Named County Ticket Yesterday

Harmony Marked Deliberations of the Convention and a Splendid Ticket Resulted.

Yesterday afternoon in accordance with the call issued by the Republican County Committee, the delegates selected at the primaries held on Saturday last, assembled at the court house in Oakland at one o'clock for the purpose of naming a county ticket to be voted for this fall and also to select delegates to the state and judicial conventions, name a county committee and to select district committees.

Mr. Jonas Yutzy, a member of the county committee, called the convention to order and Mr. U. N. Bond was named as chairman. Upon taking the position to which he had been selected Mr. Bond made a short address congratulating the Republicans of the county upon the fact that every district delegation seemed to be imbued with the purpose of naming the best men for the various positions. Mr. A. G. Ross was then named as secretary and one member from each district was appointed as a committee on rules and resolutions. A recess of fifteen minutes was declared by the chairman and in the interval the committee prepared its report as follows:

Be it resolved, By the Republican party of Garrett county in convention assembled:

That we reaffirm our allegiance to the great and fundamental principles of the Republican party as embodied in the Chicago platform, which makes for progress, advancement and prosperity of all the people of this great country.

We commend the splendid and able administration of National affairs by the Republican party and the achievements and accomplishments of President Taft.

It is gratifying to note the continued prosperity of our farmers and general improvement of farm values under Republican rule.

We endorse the new tariff law recently enacted at the special session of Congress and believe that in the execution thereof it will result in a material and greater prosperity to our people than has ever been enjoyed in the history of our country.

In the State of Maryland the Republican party stands for progressive government and right of every voter to cast his ballot according to the dictates of his conscience, and to have that vote counted as cast without running the gauntlet of a ballot arranged to defraud him.

We declare our opposition to the Straus Disfranchising Amendment. It is a bold attempt of the Democratic state machine to place itself in power indefinitely. A similar measure was overwhelmingly defeated by the votes of the people four years ago, and the present measure deserves the same fate. Not satisfied for future success under a present crooked ballot law, under which the Democratic machine has been able to perpetuate its power, it again proposes an unjust, un-democratic, unrepublican, un-American and unconstitutional restriction of the suffrage and hopes to secure its passage by false appeals through race prejudice.

We call upon all good citizens without regard to party affiliation to aid us in preventing the adoption of this iniquitious scheme.

We especially condemn that part of the election law which requires a citizen who wishes to vote to travel to the county seat, in many instances from twenty to forty miles, at considerable expense, and there required to declare his intention more than a year preceding any election in which he may desire to register that he may exercise his right to vote, and as a result of this law many good citizens and tax payers of our county are deprived of their right to vote.

We condemn the excessive costs to tax payers of the present primary election law and recommend the passage of an economical law giving the people greater privileges in the exercises of the right of suffrage.

We are in favor of authorizing Congress to enact an income tax law with reasonable exemptions for our people who have small incomes.

We favor a modification of the road law of this county, in a way that will be more satisfactory to the tax payers.

Immediately upon the presentation of the report of the committee on resolutions the convention as a body adjourned to the grand jury room where a caucus was conducted and the work of the convention was completed in the naming of the candidates as follows:

For State Senate, Harvey J. Speicher, of Accident.

For House of Delegates, J. Elbert Chappell, of Kitzmiller, and Decourcey E. Bolden, of Oakland.

For Sheriff, Andrew Shartzer, of Oakland.

For County Treasurer, Robert Lincoln Fries, of Sines.

For County Commissioners, Darius M. Dixon, of Oakland, and Walter M. Lowdermilk, of Selbysport.

For Clerk to County Commissioners, Albert G. Ross, of Oakland.

For County Surveyor, James A. Sincell, of Oakland.

For delegates to the Judicial convention, Dr. W. Ravenscroft, J. C. Renninger and Wm. A. Smith.

For delegates to the State convention, L. H. Friend, J. W. Friend, N. U. Bond, George L. Michaels, D. O. DeWitt, J. Alvin Friend, H. R. DeWitt, C. J. Rathbun, Fred. A. Thayer, W. McCulloh Brown, Burt Wilson, E. W. Kelso, George B. McMillan, Jonas Bittinger, John H. Rafter, H. L. Price, Scott T. Jones, E. H. Sincell, Benj. H. Sincell and Daniel B. Layman.

For members of the State Central Committee, Austin Brown, Andrew J. Oester and William M. Junkins.

At the conclusion of the caucus the convention was again called to order and the work of the caucus was ratified amid considerable enthusiasm, whereupon a motion was made for adjournment, which was carried after a vote of thanks had been tendered the officers of the convention.

The ticket is generally conceded as being a splendid one and is headed by the only native born Republican candidate for Senatorial honors in the history of the county. Mr. Speicher was reared on a farm near the town of Accident. He has been a resident of that section of the county during his entire lifetime and has devoted his energies to farming and stock dealing, and has been eminently successful in all his business undertakings. He comes of an excellent family and his election will reflect credit upon the Republicans and people generally of Garrett county.

In Messrs. Chappell and Bolden, as candidates for the House of Delegates, the whole people of the county can rally to their support. For many years Mr. Chappell has been a resident of Kitzmiller where he is engaged in the mercantile business and is also postmaster of that town. Mr. Bolden is a native of Oakland where he has been successfully engaged in the furniture business and as a contracting builder for a number of years; the son of an old Union soldier and at present a member of the town council of Oakland.

Mr. Andrew Shartzer, candidate for Sheriff, is another native Garrett countian. He is a successful farmer, residing just outside of Oakland on the Deer Park road. For many years it has been Mr. Shartzer's ambition to become sheriff of the county, which fact alone will spur him on to render satisfactory service to the whole people and it is hoped that he will have the united support of the party.

Mr. Robert L. Friese, of District No. 6, well equipped and entirely competent for the duties of the County Treasurer's office, is a man for whom it should be a pleasure to vote. More than three years ago Mr. Friese met with an accident which has rendered him unable to work at his trade, that of carpentry. His fealty to party and his integrity is beyond question. His election to the office for which he has been nominated is something more than a duty owed by the Republicans of the county to a deserving and unfortunate man.

The County Commissioners' candidates, Messrs. Dixon and Lowdermilk are respresentatives of the progressive farming and mercantile lines of business, Mr. Dixon being one of Oakland's most successful merchants, who by his own efforts and a desire to become a factor in the business world of this community, has established a most successful business backed with brains and a keen executiveness for details which he will take with him to the commissioners' office. Mr. Lowdermilk is one of the progressive farmers of Selbysport district where he is held in high esteem for his straightfordwardness and his abilty, and his election will reflect credit upon the people of the county.

Mr. A. G. Ross, the candidate and present incumbent of the office of Clerk to the County Commissioners, has shown his worth by his past record of good service well and faitfully rendered and his nomination is a deserved compliment as well as duty owed the nominee of the party.

Mr. James A. Sincell, Surveyor, is just completing his first term as a public official and his services as such has given general satisfaction.

Taken in its entirety the ticket is an exceptionally strong one and the harmonious feeling prevailing throughout the deliberation of the convention gives assurance that the ticket will be triumphantly elected.

GLOTFELTY FAMILY REUNION

A Large Number of This Connection Met Near Salisbury.

To the Editor of The Republican:

A reunion of the descendants of this ancient and highly respected family was held on August 4, on the old Glotfelty farm about one mile south of Salisbury, Pa. About two hundred and fifty representatives of the race were present. The occasion was one of much felicity, hospitality and good fellowship.

An excellent orchestra was present and discoursed music during the day. The needs of the inner man was satisfied by an abundant and bountiful supply of good things prepared by the skillful hands of the Glotfelty dames.

Rev. S. C. Stover, of Salisbury, read an interesting geneological sketch of the remote ancestors. Other addresses were made by Rev. H. W. Beachler, of Meyersdale; Mrs. Martha Swauger and Mrs. Lydia Simmons of Illinois. Among those in attendance from a distance were Mrs. Nettie May, of St. Louis, Mo., daughter of the late Mr. Perry Shultz and Lydia Shultz; Mrs. Lydia Simmons, of Jacksonville, Ill., and Mr. Jesse Glotfelty, of McHenry, Md.

The Glotfelty race issues from Switzerland, and the earliest records extant, (1570), are found in the town of Glotfelden, situated on the River Glatt, a tributary of the Rhine. A beautiful church built over two centuries ago contains a record of the births and baptism of the ancestors. The original name was Glotfelder, but in some way through the vicissitudes of time it became changed to Glotfelty as it stands today. A translation of the name means Smooth River.

The most remote ancestor to come to America was Casper, son of Felix, who came over in the year 1743, settling in York county, Pa., where many of his descendants live to this day.

Solomon his eldest son, born in 1738 is the ancestor of the family in Somerset and adjoining counties. He was married to Maria Eva, daughter of John Philip Fresh in the year 1765. Leaving home the same year he tarried a short season in Baltimore and Hagerstown, Md., finally making his way into Somerset county by Braddock's road. Turning a little to the right he discovered a beautiful tract of land on the slope of Meadow Mountain upon which he took up his abode, calling it "Green Park," and having for his neighbors the savage Indians, wolves, panthers, bears, etc. Here he lived a useful life until his death in the year 1818 in his 81 year.

The old German Bible brought over from the Fatherland, over two hundred year old, is still in existence. In it are the birth entries of his four sons and five daughters as they were recorded by the old Patriarch's hand in his wonderfully quaint and unique style. From these children have sprung the immense progeny which has spread to every quarter of this fair land. The old Patriarch was a blacksmith, as was indeed all the early Glotfeltys. The trade or profession seeming to descend by inheritance.

No notice of the Glotfeltys would be complete which did not remark upon their good citizenship and many excellent traits of character. May the race long continue to flourish and maintain the standard of excellence and virtues set by the forefathers. It is planned to repeat the reunion next year on a more elaborate scale.

Married.

LAWTON—LITTMAN—At the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Littman, in Oakland, last night, by Rev. J. B. Workman in the presence of the families of the contracting parties, Mr. Arthur Lawton and Miss Bessie Littman, both of Oakland. The bride is one of Oakland's best young ladies and the groom is a young man of exceptional worth. The couple left for the east at midnight and the honeymoon will be spent at Atlantic City and other points. They have the best wishes of numerous friends for a long and happy married life.

STEMPLE—WORKMAN—A wedding which will surprise many Oakland people took place last night when Mr. Grover C. Stemple, son of the late Benton Stemple, and Miss Nellie Workman, daughter of Rev. and Mrs. J. B. Workman, of Oakland, were joined in wedlock at the residence of Dr. R. B. Ward on Green Street, by Rev. J. L. B. Jones, of Elkins, West Va. A very few friends of the couple were present and it was their intention to keep the matter quiet until later but the report was given general publicity this morning. The young people have the best wishes of their many friends.

ARRESTED FOR CIRCULATING DEFAMATORY LITERATURE

Mansfield E. Frazee, of Friendsville, Tool of Others, Fined.

Yesterday afternoon Mansfield E. Frazee, of Friendsville, was brought to Oakland by Deputy Sheriff Brown on a warrant charging him with circulating literature defamatory to the characters of Dr. R. A. Ravenscroft and Mr. Harvey J. Speicher and with having caused the circulars to be transported through the U. S. mails.

The story of the inner workings of the character assassins in connection with these circulars has not all come to the surface as yet, but sufficient has been made known to open the way for the arrest of others. Mr. Frazee, who is held in high esteem by all who know him, was made the innocent tool of the author of the circulars, hundreds of which were captured by the State officers several days ago, and which are now in the possession of the authorities. After arriving in Oakland Mr. Frazee was turned over to U. S. Marshal George, of Cumberland, who took him to that city where bond in the sum of $500 was entered into for his appearance before the Commissioner Monday next when a hearing will be granted him and the case disposed of so far as Mr. Frazee is concerned.

Mr. Frazee returned to Oakland last night when he confessed himself guilty under the laws of the State and was fined $50 and costs, which he paid and was immediately released from custody, returning to his home this morning.

In his confession Mr. Frazee implicated a number of people, some of whom have been in the public eye for a number of months and other arrests will speedily follow.

A Letter From Minnesota.

The following letter from Mr. C. E. Ellithorp, of Bittinger, who is on an extended visit to friends and relatives in Minnesota, was received at this office last Thursday morning, too late for publication in last week's REPUBLICAN:

To the Editor of The Republican:

I am still right side up with care; was too tired doing nothing to write last week. It is strange how lazy one gets when they have nothing to do, especially when one is so inclined.

The weather has been very hot and dry here, with no rain to speak of since we came here. The thermometer stands from 90 to 100 in the shade, but this evening it is raining. Corn and late potatoes needed the rain very bad. Some of the corn was drying up. The dust on the roads has been fearful and it almost choked one and was as dirty as if we were in a coal mine.

Barley is all cut and most of it stacked.

Oat harvest is in full blast and the crop is a good one. Flax is ready to cut.

The old lady of whom I spoke in my former letter was buried on July 27th. Peace to her ashes. We have been enjoying some fine automobile rides with one of my cousins. The laws are very strict here on autos. One day while out in the auto we saw a buggy coming and when a long distance off the old man gave us the signal to stop which we did; the old gentleman got out and led the horse past us and as the horse paid no attention my cousin remarked to him: "Your horse doesn't seem to be much afraid." "Oh, no," replied the old gentleman, "it isn't the horse, it's the old woman that is afraid." C. E. E.

Resented Interference.

A Hagerstown dispatch to the Baltimore Sun Monday says:

"The Republican politicians are busy figuring on the results of yesterday's primaries in Washington county. It is freely predicted tonight that the defeat of Harvey S. Bomberger, of Boonsboro, as aspirant for the Court Clerkship nomination in his home district, will give his chief opponent, Harry E. Baker, the present Court Clerk, pretty clear sailing. Some go so far as to say Baker will land the nomination on the first ballot in the convention.

"The delegates elected at Keedysville and Tilghmanton favor Baker's nomination. The decisive majority at Keedysville against the Grossnickle ticket is said to be a blow aimed at Congressman George A. Pearre, who is accused of coming to Washington county and attempting to interfere with the nomination of Court Clerk Baker."

Fall Term Opening.

Week of August 30, 1909. The Tri-State Business College. Cumberland, Md. 20-6t

CAN THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY MAKE "NEGRO DOMINATION" THE ISSUE?

Accordiug to the United States census of 1900, there were 1,888,-044 people in the State of Maryland, of whom 235,064 were black. The latter, outside of Baltimore city, had shown a decrease in numbers in the decade from 1890 to 1900.

In the last few years there has been a decided awakening of public interest in Maryland in a number of questions which largely concern the welfare and the prosperity of the State, and the public has turned to the political parties for aid and encouragement in their solution through legislation. The people of Baltimore and Maryland are now interested in the proper control and regulation of the powerful public-service corporations; in the reassessment of property throughout the State so as to equalize the burden of State taxation; in the building of good roads; in the application of the merit system to the goverment of this city and the elimination of the miserable spoils system; in seeing the State take decent care of the insane; in the passage of a pure food law; in the extension of the direct primary for the selection of State andcounty officers; in an honest Senatorial primary; in the elimination of graft and extravagence at Annapolis; in the enforcement of the corrupt practices act; in doing away with "trick" ballots, and in the just representation of Baltimore in the Legislature.

Here are questions which might properly challenge the constructive ability of the highest statesmanship in Maryland. Here are issues proper to submit to any people as problems worthy of their time and attention. Yet, with all these serious matters awaiting solution, the picked delegates of a party which boasts, and truthfully boasts, that it represents the best brains and the best blood of Maryland assemble in convention and go on record with this statement:

We declare that the adoption of this amendment [disfranchisement of the negro] is the main and vital issue of the coming election.

All else is secondary. The negro "bugaboo" is once more shaken in the faces of a people who at this time are simply yearning for real political leadership, for real statesmanship to point the way so that this great metropolis can advance along the lines destiny seems to have marked out for it, and the State can gain in full measure the growth and prosperity which its natural advantages presage for it. If these political leaders are to have their way, everything else must halt while a million white people make war on the political rights of one-fourth as many black people.

It is the deliberate opinion of The News that this city and State will never attain the goal for which they are striving as long as this spirit prevails. A people, confronted by so many and so serious problems, who would permit such a transparent political subterfuge as the fear of negro domination in State of Maryland at this time to determine their attitude on public questions will fall an easy victim to the wiles of the political trickster who is never without some "paramount issue," which means nothing more than the hope of retaining place and power.—Baltimore News.

HISTORY OF CONFEDERATE FLAG

How and when the Emblem Originated.

Gen. W. L. Cabell, commander of the trans-Mississippi department of the United Confederate Veterans, declares the following to be the true history of the Confederate flag:

"When the Confederate Army, commanded by General Beauregard and the Federal Army confronted each other at Manassas it was seen that the Confederate flag and the Stars and Stripes looked at a distance so much alike that it was hard to distinguish one from another. General Beauregard, after the Battle of July 18, at Blackburn Ford, ordered that a small red badge should be worn on the left shoulder by our troops, and, as I was chief quartermaster, ordered me to purchase a large quantity of red flannel and to distribute it to each regiment.

"During the battle of Bull Run it was plain to be seen that a large number of Federal soldiers wore a similar red badge. General Johnston and Gen. Beauregard met at Fairfax Courthouse in the latter part of August and determined to have a battle flag for every regiment or detatched command.

"General Johnston's flag was in the shape of an eclipse—a red flag with blue St. Andrew's cross and stars on the cross (white) to represent the different Southern States. No white border of any kind was attached to the cross. General Beauregard's was a rectangle, red, with St. Andrew's cross and white stars, similar to General Johnson's.

"After we had discussed fully the two styles, taking into consideration the cost of material and the care of making the same, it was decided the elliptical flag would be harder to make; that it would take more cloth and it could not be seen so plainly at a distance; that the rectangular flag, drawn by and suggested by General Beauregard, should be adopted. General Johnston yielded at once.

"No one else was present but we three. No one knew about his flag but we three until an order was issued adopting the Beauregard flag, as it was called, and directing me, as chief quartermaster to have the flag made as soon as possible. I immediately issued an address to the good ladies of the South to give me their red and blue silk dresses, and to send them to Capt. Colin McRae Selph, quartermaster at Richmond, Va., Captain Selph is now living in New Orleans, where he was assisted by two elegant young ladies, the Misses Carey, from Baltimore, and Mrs. Hennigsen, of Savannah and Mrs. Hopkins, of Alabama.

"The Misses Carey made battle flags for General Beauregard and General Van Dorn and, I think, for General J. E. Johnston. They made General Beauregard's out of their own silk dresses. The flag is now in Memorial Hall, New Orleans, with a statement of that fact from General Beauregard. General Van Dorn's flag was made of heavier material, but very pretty.

"The statement going round that this flag was designed by federal prisoners is false.

General Beauregard's battle flag is in Memorial Hall, at New Orleans. The Washington Artillery battle flag can be seen at the Washington Artillery Hall."

MILLIONS FOR B. & O.

Contracts for More Than $6,000,000 Equipment Awarded.

Contracts for new equipment and rails, aggregating between $6,000,-000 and $7,000,000, were awarded last Thursday by the Baltimore and Ohio officials.

One thousand composite gondola cars; 1,000 coke cars of 100,000 pounds capacity, 600 all-steel hopper cars of like capacity, to the Standard Steel Car Company, Butler, Pa.

One thousand all-steel coke cars, 100,000 pounds capacity, Cambria Steel Company, Johnstown, Pa.

Forty-five passenger coaches and five combined passenger and baggage cars, American Car and Foundry Company, Wilmington, Del.

Ten baggage cars, five cafe and parlor cars, five all-steel postal cars, Barney & Smith Car Company, Dayton, Ohio.

All this equipment is of modern standard, and where not all-steel is to be steel underframe, such metal entering into the construction in a very practical manner.

In addition to these contracts others for 1,000 box cars, 500 refrigerator cars and 500 ventilator cars, 60 locomotives and 2 electric locomotives will be placed upon the completion of negotiations now pending.

The Baltimore and Ohio has also placed orders for steel rails of 90 and 100 pounds weight, as follows:

For 2,000 tons, open-hearth steel to the Bethlehem Steel Company, Bethlehem, Pa.

For 3,000 tons, open-hearth steel to the Illinois Steel Company, Gary.

For 12,000 tons Bessemer steel to the Carnegie Steel Company, Pittsburg.

For 10,250 tons Bessemer steel to the Maryland Steel Company, Baltimore.

Pending contracts to be filled by the company will carry the total expenditure up to $10,000,000. These additional contracts are now under consideration by the officials and will be awarded as soon as the details are arranged between the company and the contractors.

Delivery of the orders already placed will begin probably early in October. It is expected the first to be received will be the passenger coaches, after which will come the freight cars and then the locomotives.

The company expects by the first of the year to have the equipment coming alone freely.

It will then be in position to meet whatever growth of trade the optimistic manufacturer, producer and banker feels will soon come in large volume.

WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnificent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of, natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience; America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,-000,00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and believe that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator is still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

AGAINST AMENDMENT.

Independent Democrats Strongly Oppose Disfranchisement.

Independent Democrats of Baltimore took a stand against the suffrage amendment last week by forming an organization to be known as the Democratic Association Opposed to the Disfranchisement Amendment. Members of the association will be voters who are opposed to the amendment but who are not registered as Republicans.

The association, in the following statement, set forth the object of its organization:

1. Because the amendment has been framed by a body of intense partisans, seeking chiefly the perpetuation of their power as officeholders. It is their evident purpose to disfranchise such a large body of voters that the present power of the independent voter will be put an end to and Maryland will become a one-party state. This, in our opinion, would be a deplorable condition of affairs. The faulty provisions and partisan character of the General Primray Election Law passed by the legislature of 1908 show what complete domination the Democratic ring proposes to exercise.

2. It cannot be shown that the present law of Maryland permitting all men to vote except those convicted of crime, has been a disadvantage to our state. On the contrary, had it not been for the independent vote and the negro vote, Maryland's electoral vote would twice have been given to the candidates advocating "free silver" and other financial heresies. Maryland being a conservative state the wisdom of any change in our Constitution should be thoroughly demonstrated.

3. It is untrue to say that there is any danger of negro domination in Maryland, for the negro population is less than 18 per cent of the whole, and this proportion is constantly decreasing. The United States Census shows the remarkable fact that in all Maryland (excluding Baltimore city) the total negro population actually decreased from 156,000 to 155,000 in the 20 years from 1880 to 1900. It is remembered that the amendment was brought forward for the benefit of the counties. The voters of Maryland should, therefore, resent the effort now being made by the Democratic politicians to create throughout the country the impression that our state is in the same condition as Mississippi or South Carolina.

4. It is not our purpose at the present time to discuss in detail the proposed amendment. We object to a perpetual privileged class created by the "grandfathers' clause." It is un-American and un-democratic. The Democratic party has been pledged to insert an educational test in any suffrage amendment it would put before the people. This pledge has been violated and a disingenuous scheme substituted under which intelligence is entirely disregarded. No questions are asked of the applicant to register, and without aid of any kind he is required to write down correctly some 15 matters which have little bearing on his right to vote. For example, if he cannot write out correctly the full name of the governor of Maryland, the mayor of Baltimore and a judge of the Court of Appeals he will not be allowed to register. The provision is simply a shrewd and dishonest test of memory, which hardly one educated white man in a thousand could hope to pass. We unhesitatingly declare that such a law would be a disgrace to our state.

5. Finally, we oppose the amendment because we believe it to be directly contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land in Maryland as well as elsewhere.

MONEY IN MULES.

Average 3-Year-Olds Bring $200 Each Larger Animals Twice As Much.

Raising mules for the market is an industry which for some reason is almost entirely neglected in the Eastern and middle States, yet there is no safer, surer method of making money, especially for the small farmer.

The notion that one needs boundless acres or a ranch covering half a county to raise mules successfully has been threshed out and exploded long ago. There are no extensive mule breeding plants in Missouri, yet this State raises the largest and finest mules in the whole world.

A farmer with a hundred acres could raise a couple of mules every year. When three years old, if a fair size, they will bring him $200 each. If extra large and well shaped they will bring almost as much more. There is always a demand and a ready market for any mule, and the bigger the mule the bigger the price.

One man with a farm of 200 acres keeps one driving horse and ten mares. Each one of these mares raises a mule colt every year besides doing all the farm work, and on this particular farm there is plenty for them to do.

The colts are allowed to run with the mares until four months old. They are then placed in a pasture by themselves and are never allowed to stop growing until they have attained their full growth. From the time they leave the mare until the time they are shipped to market they are never fed hay or oats. Sowed corn, bean fodder, cornstalks and straw in winter and grass in summer is their diet.

"My experience," writes this farmer in Country Life in America, "has taught me that mules thrive best on coarse food—not fence rails and the windy end of a barn, but any other food than hay or oats. My rations for sixty mules engaged in heavy railroad construction work are six quarts of corn a day for each, and one bundle of rye straw for two mules at night.

"It would be hard to find a smoother, slicker bunch anywhere, and they have not lost a week's work in five years. They are groomed and curried every night, the same as any valuable working horse, and the drivers are never allowed to whip. Any abuse or overloading results in the quick discharge of the driver, for a mule is of all working animals the most timid and shy. They will go any place and do anything if they know it is all right, and if they do not know it will not do it.

More Than He Could Say.

A native-born American member of a party of four business men who often lunched together took great delight in joking the others on their foreign birth.

"It's all very well for you fellows to talk about what we need in this country," he said, "but when you come to think of it, you're really only intruders. Not one of you was born here. You're welcome to this country, of course, but you really oughtn't to forget what you owe us natives who open our doors to you."

"Maybe," said an Irishman in the party, thoughtfully. "Maybe. But there's one thing you seem to forget: I came into this country wid me fare paid an' me clothes on me back. Can you say the same?"—Everybody's Magazine.

SAW HIS BROTHER STARVE TO DEATH

CRIPPLED WITH RHEUMATISM, JOHN FLAHERTY WAS UNABLE TO HELP MAN.

BEGS FOR A GLASS OF WAT.

Invalid, Almost Helpless, Spends Hours Trying to Crawl Only a Few Feet—Taken to Hospital Seriously Ill.

New York.—Michael Flaherty was found the other night sitting up dead in a chair in his little shack in Bay avenue in the Greenville section of Brooklyn. He had been dead 36 hours, and had died of starvation. Beside him lay his brother John, 60 years of age, helpless with rheumatism and weakness. John was hurried to the hospital as rapidly as possible and when he was undressed $1,350 was found in his pockets.

The men were found by the merest chance. John James, a butcher, happened to drive by the place late in the afternoon, and saw the dead Michael sitting staring out of the window. The butcher had seen him in the same position Friday and also Saturday. The man seemed to look worse than he had on the two previous days, so James got off his wagon and knocked at the door.

When no answer came he burst the door in. The sight that met his eyes staggered him. John lay on the floor moaning feebly; his tongue was black and protruded from his mouth. The butcher bent over him and heard him murmur a single word: "Water."

The butcher drew water from a tap near at hand, and dashed it in the man's face. He then turned his attention to Michael, and found that he was dead.

John was rushed to the hospital. He became unconscious on the way and was revived only after the most heroic work. He was then able to tell a story which for its horror rivals anything that ever came from the brain of Edgar Allan Poe.

John Tried to Get to His Brother But Failed.

The two aged men, it seems, have lived for nearly a year in the little shack. It is miserably furnished and has but two rooms. Since the men took up their residence there John Flaherty had become practically a cripple from rheumatism. Wednesday night, he said, while he lay in one room and his brother in another, he heard his brother call faintly for water. John tried to get to him but failed. After a while he called to Michael, and as the other man did not reply John presumed that he had fallen asleep.

Thursday morning dawned and wore on to noon. A half dozen times John tried to get to his brother but was still unable to drag himself across the floor. He lay helpless all day, fell into a doze at dusk, and again about midnight he heard his brother cry once more for water. Again he was unable to get to him.

The distance between him and his brother was probably a dozen feet. The cripple knew that his brother was in dire extremity, and, weak as he was himself, determined to get to him if it cost him his life. He decided to crawl to him foot by foot. His brother, when well, had always brought the crippled John his food.

John, when he began his tragic progress across the floor to the other sick man, was so weak from pain and starvation that every move caused him to lapse into unconsciousness. A foot of progress, then a couple of hours of stupor, then another foot, then another period of unconsciousness. So the horrible hours dragged on.

When John was found he was within a foot of his brother's chair.

The $1,350 in his pockets remains from $1,500 which the brothers received a year ago from the sale of a piece of property.

BIG-VEIN COAL MEN WIN.

Commission Orders Railroads To Reduce George's Creek Rates.

The Interstate Commerce Commission have published its opinion in the case of the American Coal Company of Allegany County and the Wachovia Coal Company of Baltimore City against the Baltimore and Ohio, the Western Maryland, the Pennsylvania and a large number of the railway companies in the George's Creek basin coal cases. On the testimony adduced of record the commission holds:

That the railroads' rates on big-vein coal from George's Creek basin, in Allegany county, Maryland, and the Elk Garden region to tidewater when going over the piers to destination outside the Delaware and Chesapeak capes are unreasonable and unduly discriminatory and ought not to exceed the rates contemporaneously in effect on small-vein coal from the same district and coal from Meyersdale, Austen, Newburg and Upper Potomac districts in Pennsylvania and West Virginia when waterborne to the same destinations.

That the railroads' rates on coal mined in George's Creek basin and in the Elk Garden region when destined to points in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and New England, are unreasonable and discriminatory and ought not to exceed the rates to the same destination from Meyersdale, Austen, Newburg and Upper Potomac regions.

George's Creek basin for ten years or more has been grouped for rate-making purposes with the Meyersdale, Austen, Newburg and Upper Potomac districts, and Philadelphia, Baltimore, Wilmington and other points of consumption for a like period of time have taken a group rate from all these mines. The commission in its decision, rendered by Commissioner Harlan, holds that no showing is made to justify an order disturbing the grouping of coal-producing districts and coal-consuming destinations.

Collateral with this decision, which is of great importance to the coal regions of Maryland, the commission has passed an order which directs that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and other defendants shall on or before September 20, 1909, and for a period of two years after that abstain from charging, demanding, collecting or receiving for the transportation of big-vein coal originating at mines at points in the George's Creek basin and the Elk Garden region when shipped over the piers at tidewater and water-borne to destinations inside and outside Delaware and Chesapeake capes rates that are in excess of the rates for the transportation of small-vein coal to said points from said mines or that are in excess of the rates for the transportation of coal from the Pennsylvania and West Virginia fields. The railroad are also ordered by the commission to put in force by September 20 next the same rates on big-vein coal from the George's Creek and Elk Garden region for the above destinations as are now in force for the transportation of small-vein coal and the order is so worded as to direct the observance of the other principles laid down in the opinion.

Some years ago a reduction was ordered in the rates of small-vein coal from George's Creek in order that it might compete with the West Virginia coal. Now the same rate is ordered on the big-vein coal.

Regarding the reduction in output of big-vein coal, Commissioner Harlan's opinion says "that the closer approach of many big-vien mines to the point of exhaustion, the lengthening of their underground workings, the increasing troubles with water in the mines, etc.," have at a disadvantage in in competition with coals of like quality from other districts.

"The long headings and consequently long underground hauls require, besides an extension of the underground tracks, the use of motors and other mechanical devices not needed in the small-vein mines: and in other ways the cost of production has so increased in recent years that it is said now to exceed the cost in some of the competing districts by as much as 25 cents a ton.

"The consequence is that a number of mines have been closed and many miners are idle."

The second point in the case of the complainants was a demand for lower rates from Georges Creek basin to tide water and local points because of the shorter haul when compared with the distance from the mines in the Pennsylvania and West Virginia fields. The Pennsylvania fields are west and north of George's Creek on the Pittsburg branch of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad and are from 50 to 100 miles more distant from tidewater points than are the mines of George's Creek. The mines in West Virginia fields lie from 60 to 85 miles south and west of Georges Creek basin, on the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio, and also on the line of the Western Maryland, and are to that extent more distant from tide water than the Georges Creek mines.

"From Cumberland to Baltimore as the record discloses there is a descending grade, and the other conditions of transportation seem to be less complicated than is the case west of Cumberland. The tracks from the two fields on the west lead up to Cumberland on an ascending grade," the opinion states.

"The complainants urge that these adverse conditions of transportation from the West Virginia and Pennsylvania fields, when considered together with their mileage, justify lower rates from George's Creek basin than from mines in those two districts. In this connection the complainants also call attention to the fact that the distance from George's Creek basin to tide water at Baltimore is but 229 miles, as compared to 295 miles at Wilmington and 325 miles at Philadelphia. On this ground they also ask rates to tide water at Baltimore that are lower in proportion to mileage than the present rates to Philadelphia and Wilmington.

"While we are not disposed to criticise the desire on the part of the operators of George's Creek to secure better rates than their competitors in the other two fields enjoy, we are not inclined, on the other hand, to yield to their demand. There are many coal groups that are much more extensive than this group. Moreover, it has been our understanding that group rates, particularly on such a commodity as coal, are advantageous to the public, the carriers and the mine owners alike. The disruption of this grouping of coal-producing districts and coal-consuming destinations after it has been in effect for so many years could not fail to lead to a widespread confusion in coal rates, and we see nothing in the record to justify such an order."

PRODUCTION OF COAL IN 1908

Interesting Figures Given Out by U. S. Geological Survey Department.

The total production of coal in Pennsylvania in 1908, as reported by the United States Geological Survey was 200,448,281 short tons, having a spot value of $276,995,152. This included 74,347,102 long tons (equivalent to 83,268,754 short tons) of anthracite, with a spot value of $158,178,849, and 117,179,527 short tons of bituminous with a spot value of $118,816,303.

The production of both anthracite and bituminous coal in Pennsylvania in 1908 was less than in 1907, but owing to the fact that anthracite no longer enters to any great extent into manufacturing industries, it was less seriously affected by the financial depression than bituminous coal. The aggregate production of both kinds in 1908 showed a decrease of 35,299,208 short tons, or 14.97 per cent, in quantity and of $42,252,930, or 13.24 per cent. in value from that of 1907. The decrease in the production of bituminous coal in Pennsylvania from 1907 to 1908 was 32,963,650 short tons, or 21.95 per cent., in quantity, and $36,849,723, or 23.67 per cent. in value.

In spite of the decreased production, the number of men employed in the coal mines of Pennsylvania in 1908 showed an increase of 9,606 over 1907, the number reported in 1908 being 340,135. Of this number 174,174 were in the anthracite mines, against 167,234 in 1907, and the bituminous mine workers increased from 163,295 to 165,961. The average number of days worked decreased in the bituminous mines from 255 to 201. The average annual production per man in the bituminous mines was 706 short tons in 1908 against 919.5 tons in 1907. The daily average per man in 1908 was 2.13 long tons (2.39 short tons) of anthracite and 3.51 short tons of bituminous coal. In 1907 the average production per man was 2.08 long tons (2.23 short tons) of anthracite and 3.61 short tons of bituminous coal.

From 1876 to 1880 the average production of bituminous coal was 1.41 times that of anthracite, but from 1901 to 1905 the production of bituminous coal was 4.08 times that of hard coal.

The first records of bituminous coal production in Pennsylvania are for the year 1840, when 464,826 short tons were mined. From 1814 to the close of 1908 the total production of both anthracite and bituminous has amounted to about 4,000,000,000 short tons, the production of anthracite being slightly more than half.

Most of the bituminous mines of Pennsylvania are operated on the eight hour basis. Out of a total of 165,961 men employed in 1908, 99,406, distributed among 764 mines, worked eight hours; 24,828, employed in 241 different mines, worked nine hours; and 38,125, employed in 197 mines worked ten hours.

Except for a suspension of operations which lasted practically throughout the month of April, pending an adjustment of the wage scale, there were no strikes or lockout of sufficient importance to affect the trade as a whole.

James E. Roderick, chief of the department of mines of Pennsylvania, reports that 1,250 men were killed and 2,189 injured in the coal mines of Pennsylvania in 1908, as against 1,314 men killed and 2,576 injured in 1907. Of the 1908 fatalities, 678 occurred in the anthracite mines and 672 in the bituminous mines. Of the nonfatal accidents, 1,178 occurred in the anthracite mines and 1,019 in the bituminous mines. The death rate per thousand employes in the anthracite mines was 3.89 in 1908, against 4.23 in 1907; the death rate in the bituminous mines 3.45 in 1908 and 4.04 in 1907. In the anthracite mines 57 deaths, or a little less than 9 per cent. of the the fatalities, were due to gas explosions; 284 or 42 per cent., were due to falls of roof of coal; powder explosions killed 23; mine car accidents 90; shaft accidents 13; miscellaneous accidents inside the mines killed 129; and 82 employes were killed outside the mines. In the bituminous mines 162 persons, or 28 per cent. of the total, were killed by gas or dust explosions, and 263, or 46 per cent., were killby falls of roof or coal.

In the production of bituminous coal alone Pennsylvania far outranks the other coal-producing States, the output in 1908 having been nearly 2½ times that of Illinois, which ranks second.

M. R. Campbell, of the United States Geological Survey, places the amount of coal originally in the anthracite fields of Pennsylvania at 21,000,000,000 short tons and in the bituminous fields at 112,574,000,000 short tons. There is still in the ground approximately 16,970,000,000 ton of anthracite, which would be capable of producing, at the rate of one ton of coal lost for each ton mined, 8,425,000,000 tons, or approximately 102 times the anthracite produced in 1908.

Of bituminous coal there is still in the ground more than 109,000,000,000 short tons, about 930 times the production of 1908. In other words, if the exhaustion is 1½ times the production of bituminous in Pennsylvania, at the rate of production in 1908 the supply would last approximately 620 years.

The Lady and the Cobra.

An Englishwoman residing in India one evening found to her horror that a huge cobra had coiled itself about her veranda rails, near which she sat playing the violin. She was too near the snake to run with safety, so she continued playing while she gradually edged away. At first her only idea was to keep the creature thus engaged while she escaped, but when she had gained a safer distance and perhaps fascinated by the unwonted sight a strange inspiration seized her. She played air after air of different characters.

The effect was magical. That snake behaved like an ardent, hot blooded disciple of Paganini. Every variation in the music, whether of volume or of tone, produced instantly a corresponding change in the attitude of the cobra. If she played a lively dance it swayed its body sideways in quick time and yet in graceful curves. Once she struck a number of false notes in rapid succession on purpose. The cobra winced and writhed in pain, as if suddenly struck with a whip.

Thus the creature behaved like a mad musician till the lady getting tired of the sport, gradually moved herself farther and farther and then made a sudden bolt into her room and banged the door, leaving the cobra to wander disconsolate to its lair in the fields.—London Chronicle.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc.

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 19, 1909.

THAT foot is evidently still on their necks.

IT MUST be admitted that the local unterrified are afraid of each other.

POOR Governor Crothers, with his executive duties pressing heavy upon him, a machine that is becoming clogged and out of whack, his labors are becoming onerous endeavoring to harmonize the local Democracy.

REVOLT IN QUEEN ANNES

From Queen Annes comes a story of Democratic strife that finds counterpart in some form or other in many other parts of the state. The Queen Annes fight that has called into the field an independent Democratic ticket is but an index finger pointing to the inevitable defeat of the Democratic party through the sowing of the seeds of discord by the fatuous leaders. The defectants take pretty high ground, but it is manifestly Republican ground, with some trimming that give it Democratic flavor. This fact is not material, however, as compares with the general impression of the bunglesome manning of the Democratic situation in the state this fall. Unfortunate it is for the interests of the party that seeks entrenchment; fortunate for the people, who will be taught by the discords and the wranglings in the Democratic household the hazard of placing the state in perpetual bondage to the Bourbons.

The denunciations by the Queen Annes independents of the Wilson law and the Straus amendment are but echoes of widespread disaffection in the Democratic ranks with regard to the political corruption and the debasing resources to which every self-respecting Democrat will have to give countenance if he supports the ticket. The Queen Annes bolters propose a modified suffrage plank which possesses no especial merit. The fact is that the Republican party in Queen Annes as elsewhere, occupies the solid ground of popular interest. The Republican party long ago discovered the tenor of the public mind, and this, happily, was in accord with the spirit of that party. The present is no time to propose any kind of suffrage modification. The people are thoroughly sickened with the veil of duplicity that shrouds the efforts of the Democratic party to tamper with the franchise. They are fixed in their purpose of reading a severe lesson to those who would poison the political springs at their source in the Constitution. There is only one straight road to pursue, and that is to overthrow beyond the possibility of revival the deadening and destructive plan of the Democratic party to foist upon the voters of the state an imposition that would bring Maryland under tutelage to political sutocracy, perhaps for generations to come.

The outbreaks of disaffection in the Democratic ranks is the percurser of that emphatic and decisive defeat which if the signs are read aright, the people are preparing to administer to the party. The fabric of the machine is breaking under the pressure of duress, and the various counties are in active or incipient revolt. Grievances, local in character and that ordinarily would not be aired, are now symptoms of acute disaffection. This is because of general dissatisfaction with the manner in which the party has been controlled. Thus the forces of political justice are operating for the overthrow of the devisors of ill for the people.

THE DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM

After a day of battle cries and exhibitions of the rancor that customarily attends the brotherhood assemblies of the Maryland Democrats a set of resolutions was adopted last week by that party that pledged the party to the suffrage amendment as the main and vital issue. But in order to dress the dish that is unpalatable to many to the taste of all, the counties made a nominal capitulation to the city. Baltimore Democrats have only a party interest in the amendment; they have a vital interest in fuller representation. In consideration of their support of the suffrage proposal they therefore, have a promise of fuller representation in the legislature for Baltimore. The resolution pledges the party to the promotion of a constitutional amendment providing for a Baltimore equal representation in the House on the basis of population and in the Senate representation upon the basis of one senator for every city unit having a population as great as that of the largest county. Thus the mountain has labored and brought fourth a mouse. The only semblance to a city victory is a queak in the convention resolutions. As the promise was made simply in the line of a trade for the support for a nefarious project, there is little chance that, should the Democrats be victorious, the proposal for enlarged city representation will proceed a step furthur. It was not an honest measure adopted upon its merits, but a partisan proposal adopted for the purpose of buncombe.

The senatorial primary law stands upon absolutely shifting foundations. The party will do well if it can keep it from being lost in the quicksand before the campaign comes to a close. The motive of the managers in indorsing this scheme of designating candidates is hardly open to doubt. They purpose to play a political card in the hope of making the Republican party follow suit. That party has yet its issue to frame, and for the present it is important only to point out that the primaries, senatorial and otherwise, have not freed the people one whit from boss control, but the Democratic boss has been even more in evidence. Making the primaries compulsory will not make them either more popular or more serviceable. The Democratic brand of primaries has not found favor with the people.

The administration of Austin L. Crothers, unproductive as it has been, receives perfunctory indorsement, and good roads, which seems to be an eminently virtuous project for the party to lend its sanction to, are indorsed likewise, despite the fact that they have in no instance materialized. As for the record of the Democratic legislature, it has been so barren of good results that the mere fact of calling attention to it should be embarrassing to the party. The public utilities commission idea receives indorsement. It would be a fine board for politicians with a determined pull and purpose. But let it pass—the Democratic party has committed itself in words to the idea that a year ago was so foreign to the thinking of the Governor that he confessed he did not know what such a commission comprehended.

The one philosophic principle, the one logical thread in the Democratic position, is that the party, casting about for measures that have enough of double interpretation to fool a portion of the population, have fabricated a scheme of campaign based upon no fundamental and honest purpose to do the state good, but simply to take care of the fortunes of the professional politician. This broad and sweepieg declaration will find justification from an analysis of the resolutions in the light of the party's recent history and accomplishments.—Baltimore American.

A GOOD CLIMATE

The rain which fell in this State last night did incalculable good to crops, and it is to be hoped means an end of the drought which this section almost invariably suffers from some time during the summer season. The estimate of loss due to lack of moisture is probably some what exaggerated, since the droutht has not been uncommonly prolonged; but the damage has unquestionably been heavy. This season it struck Maryland in a tender spot, since it hurt the small fruit for which the State is famous. Everybody suffers more or less from the deprivation, but the hardship is especially felt by the truck farmers and others who depend for a livelihood on the production of their gardens and farms. On the whole, Maryland has not suffered worse than other sections. Take the climate here month in and month out and the State has little to complain about. It should be remembered that the only drawback here is an occasional drought and a little excess in humidity for a few days at a time during the summer. Outside of these two objectionable features, Maryland's summer, fall, winter and spring—take them as they come and go—are hard to beat. —Baltimore News.

A DEMOCRAT'S OBJECTIONS TO THE AMENDMENT.

We have had a statement from President Taft that the proposed suffrage amendment in this state is unconstitutional. We have had the opinion of other first-class lawyers that if it ever gets before the Supreme Court it will bring the whole scheme in our sister states farther South—which are struggling with a negro problem beside which that of Maryland is insignificant—tumbling down like a stack of cards. In addition, it is worth noting that there are minor defects in the law.

John Hinkley, Democrat and lawyer, in an interview explaining why he would not vote for the amendment—after saying that the fact that it, in his judgment, is unconstitutional and that as a lawyer he has sworn to support the Constitution of the country is reason enough for his opposition—proceeded to give other good arguments against it. It is interesting to observe that Mr. Hinkley agrees with George R. Gaither, Jr., in the belief that the amendment would disfranchise a large number of native-born sons of foreign-born parents not naturalized prior to 1869.

As an additional argument against the amendment, Mr. Hinkley believes that disfranchisement of the negro would make Maryland a one-party state, and he does not believe in putting this power in the hands of any party—not even his own.—Baltimore News.

Farm Sold.

The farm of Col. J. M. Burns, near Mountain Lake Park, was sold last Thursday, through the agency of Lieut. E. S. West, to Mr. W. W. Wiseman, of Gilmer county, W. Va., who will take possession on October 1st. The farm is a splendidly located piece of property, highly productive and has upon it modernly constructed buildings. Col. Burns disposed of the farm owing to his continued ill-health. He retains his home at Mountain Lake Park, however, which we trust he will continue to occupy for many years to come.

INTER-STATE GOOD ROADS CONFERENCE

To Be Held at Mt. Lake Park August 27th-30th.

The proposed Good Roads meeting at Mountain Lake Park to be held conjointly by the good roads advocates of Maryland and West Virginia promises to be more of a success than anticipated. Much interest in the meeting is apparent and indications point to the presence of many prominent men of both states. For the occasion a program has been arranged which covers the four days' meeting of the advocates of improved roads, which is presented below:

Friday, August 27th, 8:00 p. m.—Inter-State Good Roads banquet, to be held at the Mountain Lake Hotel. Tickets will be $1.00. All applicants for tickets should send their names with the money to Dr. W. W. Davis, Mountain Lake Park, Md., by Wednesday, Aug. 25th.

Saturday, August 28th, 9:00 to 9:30 a. m.—"The Road Laws of West Virginia and Their Application," by Mr. C. P. Light, commissioner of highways of West Virginia.

9:30-10:00 a. m.—Open conference.

10:00-10:30 a. m.—"Building Good Roads in Maryland," by a representative of the Maryland Highways Commission.

10:30-11:00 a. m.—Open conference.

11:00 a. m.—Address by Mr. Archer B. Hulbert, Marietta, Ohio, representative of the Agricultural Department, on "Road Economics."

3:00 p. m.—General conference on Good Roads, conducted by Hon. W. M. Havs, assistant secretary of the Department of Agriculture.

8:00 p. m.—"The Alpha and Omega of Good Roads," an illustrated lecture by Mr. Charles H. Hoyt, of the Department of Agriculture.

Sunday, August 29th, 10:30 a. m.—Sermon, "Good Roads and the Kingdom." Preacher to be announced later.

Monday, August 30th, 9:00-12:00 a. m.—Addresses by a number of prominent speakers.

Monday Afternoon—A series of addresses, in which the county commissioners of Maryland and the members of the county courts of West Virginia will take part. Monday afternoon's meeting will deal almost exclusively with the county commissioner's problems.

Monday Evening—Popular platform meeting, speakers to be announced later.

The Governors of Maryland and West Virginia have both promised to be present and will deliver addresses.

Base Ball.

MT. LAKE PARK 3, FROSTBURG 0.

In one of the most exciting games of the season Mt. Lake defeated Frostburg, the strongest team in Western Maryland, on Tuesday by a close score. The game was of a sensational order. It was won through the opportune hitting of the Mt. Lake Park boys. Boyle who pitched for the victors, was effective, pulling himself out of the hole on two differant occasions with men on second and third bases. "Huck" Finn, a former pitcher of the Charlotte team of the Carolina League, was in the box for the visitors and was touched up for eleven safe hits. The feature of the game was a sensational one-hand running catch by Jack Grimes which blasted Frostburg's of hope scoring two men in the seventh enning.

The score:

	R	H	E
Frostburg	0	8	0
Mt. Lake	3	11	1

Batteries: Finn and Carroll; Boyle and Dawson.

OAKLAND 5, LONACONING 0.

Oakland defeated Lonaconing in a well played game Tuesday, at the Oakland Ball Park by the score of 5 to 0. Both teams played good ball. Coney lost throught the inability of hitting Burry, a former twirler of the Charleroi, Pa., team, who was on the mound for the local team, getting but three scatterd hits off his delivery. Burry's pitching was a decided feature of the game.

The score:

	P	H	E
Lonaconing	0	1	4
Oakland	5	7	3

Batteries: Grindle, Barclay and Sloan; Burry and Dawson.

Lime. Lime. Lime.

Any one wanting lime for fall crops write W M. Bisnop, Terra Alta, W. Va., for prices delivered at your nearest railroad station, either in lump or granulated. Analysis of this limestone shows 89.95 carbonate of lime. We have limestone in this section that only shows 66.89 carbonate of lime. It does not require any more labor to put the high grade lime on your land and you get about 25 per cent. more lime from every ton used, or you would get as much pure lime from fifteen hundred pounds of the high grade lime as you would from two thousand pounds of the lime that only shows 66.89 carbonate of lime, therefore you handle five hundred pounds more of the low grade lime in very ton to get the same result, which is quite an item to the farmer.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The season so far has been a success, in attendance and in the program furnished on the platform. But one week remains of the Chautauqua, the prominent features of the daily program being as follows:

Friday, 20th—"Recognition Day." 11.00 a. m. Lecture by Robt. M. Moore, Washington. 2 p. m. March of Chautauquans, class of 1909. 8. p. m. Full evening of colored Moving Pictuers, including "Cinderella" and the story of "Rip Van Winkle."

Saturday, 21st—11 a. m. Chalk Talk by George Little. 8.00 p. m. Great Week-end Entertainment. Solos, Illustrated Songs and Moving Pictures.

Sunday, 22nd—11.00 a. m. Morning Sermon, "The Immortality of a Transfer," Dr. Henry C. Risner, Tyler, Texas. 7.00 p. m. Eventide Song Service.

Monday, 23rd—11.00 a. m. Lecture, "An Eagle Feather." by Dr. Henry C. Risner. 8.00 p. m. "Ben Hur," Gen. Lew Wallace's Immortal Story told by means of colored stereopticon views and Moving Pictures, giving the "Charlot Race.

Tuesday, 24th—11.00 a. m. Lecture. "The Story of the Ages," Rev. Dr. G. S. Holmes. 7.30 p. m. Thirty minutes of impersonations and lightning changes by Mr. Harry White, New York City, followed at 8.00 by a Grand Concert, by the famous Lotus Glee Club of New York City and Illustrated Songs and Moving Pictures.

Wednesday, 25th—"Musical Festival Day." 11.00 a. m. Harry White the impersonator and lightning change artist. 2.30 p. m. "The Great White World," Capt. Evelyn Briggs Baldwin, manager of the Zeigler-Baldwin Arctic Expedition. Elaborate collection of curios. 7.00 p. m. Grand Closing Entertainment and brief lecture by Capt. Baldwin, "The First Time Across the Arctic Ocean," illustrated by a series of stereoptican views and followed by a double display of moving pictures. 9.30 p. m. Brilliant display of Fireworks as the excursion trains depart.

Mr. Burt Seese and Miss Rose Heenan were married at the Mountain Lake Hotel here after many exciting and thrilling experiences. They are from Clarksburg and they are at present residing in that city with Mrs. Maggie Cuuningham, Mr. Seese's mother. They had eloped and they were stopped at Clarksburg, W. Va. from boarding boarding Baltimore and Ohio train No. 4, after which they drove to Salem, W. Va., accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Ray Seese and there their unusual experiences, which lasted two days only began. After arriving at Salem, they were unable to get a Baltimore and Ohio fast train to stop, so in the carriage they had taken to Salem they continued to Bristol, W. Va., and spent the rest of the night at the home of Mr. Ray Seese's mother-in-law. The following morning they took a train bound to Oakland, but thinking that they would be intercepted by the authorities at Grafton, they stopped at Webster, just west of Grafton. Ray Seese, however, went to Grafton, secured a carriage and driving back to Webster got the bridal party and then drove around Grafton to Thornton, thereby evading any possibility of being intercepted at Grafton. At Thornton, the first train out was taken to Oakland, but when nearing that place the possibility of running into trouble again loomed up, so Miss Heenan, Mrs. Seese and Mr. Burt Seese went through to Mountian Lake Park, while Ray Seese, the best man, got off at Oakland, secured the marriage license and the services of a preacher and drove to Mountain Lake Park where the ceremony took place a short time afterwards.

The ladies of the M. E. church will serve lunches and ice cream and cake on the large veranda of the Mallette cottage on the closing day of the Chautauqua, Wednesday next. Proceeds to go to parsonage fund.

The Maulsby cottage in Cosy Row was purchased last week by Mr. Barnard, who has been residing on the same street. The price paid was $1,225.

The natural gas franchise has again been blocked, but the delay will only be temporary. "The People" want the gas and they will get it in the end.

On account of rain the excursion to the Park Tuesday was not so large as had been expected, but the amphitheatre was well filled in the afternoon and evening. The program was one of the best ever given here. The afternoon address by Gov. Glenn, of North Carolina, was greatly enjoyed by the large audience.

A great crowd is expected on the closing day next Wednesday, when a splendid program will be presented.

Our base ball team won the game from the Frostburg team Tuesday afternoon by a scoge of 3 to 0.

Preaching in the M. E church Sunday evening at 8.15.

GAS MAIN BROKE MONDAY MORNING NEAR DOUGLAS

And Serious Inconvience To Consumers In Oakland Resulted.

That which may never again occur to the mains of the Northern Natural Gas Company took place last Monday morning about 1.30 o'clock when the main supplying Oakland and all towns east, including Cumberland and the towns along George's Creek, parted at a point near Douglas, West Va., where the pipe crosses a small stream.

The cause of the accident was a terrific downpour of rain, resembling in volume and the damage wrought to fields and crops, a cloudburst. At all events the small stream was without a moment's notice converted into a raging torrent and the pressure of water against the pipe tore out two lengths and completely cut off the supply of gas from the towns depending upon it for fuel as well as light.

In additions to causing a break in the gas mains, telephone and telegraph service all along the line of the gas company was seriously crippled, resulted in a delay in locating the trouble and getting men to to the place to repair the damages. The repairs were all made, however, within a comparatively short time and gas was on and burning in Oakland by four o'clock Monday afternoon.

Many people in Oakland who had discarded their ranges and had installled gas stoves in their kitchens were somewhat surprised when they attempted to light the fires preparatory to getting breakfast and many expedients were resorted to. One man, a father of a family of six or eight, said that his wife had prepared the morning meal in a chafing dish. Another resorted to the stove in the laundry, while others went to hotels and restaurants and broke their fast.

In commenting on the break the Cumberland News of Monday said:

In Cumberland the lunch rooms, all of which have been using gas almost exclusively, were compelled to resort to the use of coal, charcoal and other means of cooking; the city water plant had to be changed back so that coal could be used under the boilers; the N. & G. Taylor tin mill plant in South Cumberland, which had just completed a heat when the pressure became low, had to stop work; the German Brewery was compelled to stop and change back to the use of coal, and the large Footer dying establishment, which happily was well equipped for such an emergency, was compelled to stop and make the change back to the use of coal. Many families throughout the city were compelled to eat a cold breakfast or have the neighbors to cook their meals and some of the hotels in the city were in the same predicament.

The escaping gas threw the water from the bed of the creek fifty feet in the air.

Mr. D. Grant Smith, formerly of this office but for a number of years an employing printer at Grafton, and later connected with the Grafton Republican, has severed his connection with that paper and is now on a visit to his old home in Preston county, West Va. Mr. Smith may locate in Baltimore and engage in business.

Mr. E. H. Wolfe, of near Cranesville, was in Oakland Tuesday when he left on our desk a number of apples grown on his farm last year, the fruit being exceedingly well preserved, and perfect in every respect. Mr. Wolfe also informed us that on eight and a half acres of land he harvested 228 bushels of wheat. Who can beat this record?

Mr. Howard Robinson, of Baltimore, arrived in Oakland last Saturday where he is the guest of his sister, Mrs. M. C. Hinebaugh. Accompanying Mr. Robinson was a party of young people, who are stopping at Mrs. Johnson's, composed of Misses Mabel and Lillian Hyde, Miss Helen DeShields, Miss Clara Price and Mr. Lou Rhodrick, all of Baltimore.

FOR SALE—Gasoline Engine in first class condition, 1½ H. P. sufficient to run cream separator, feed cutter, or pump; first cost $100. Will sell with batteries, water connection, cheap. Also one cast kitchen range in first class condition, six holes, water back and front, with connection to hot water tank and warming oven, cost $35. R. E. SLIGER.

Mr. E. R. Parker, of near Sunnyside, was in Oakland last Friday when he reported the loss by fire of his sawmill a few nights previous. The cause of the fire was unknown to Mr. Parker, but but he is of the opion that it was an accidental nature. He has already purchased a new equiptment and will have it in operation within a few weeks.

Every now and then some one comes to us to know why a certain business transaction or other concern was not mentioned in our paper. The matter we had probably heard in a round about way, but nothing definite had ever been told us. We are publishers, but not detectives. If you want a certain thing in which you are interested written up, you had better call on a representative of your paper and give him some definite information about it or the chances are that it will never appear in print.—Mountain Echo.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. JONAS WEITZELL.

Mrs. Ellen Weitzell, aged 54 years, wife of Jonas Weitzell, died Sunday at noon, after a lingering illness of about two years. The cause of her death was cancer of the stomach. She was for some time a patient at Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore. She was born in the house in which she died, near New Germany. She was the daughter of the late John Sigler. Three sons and five daughters survive her: Lawrence, of Westernport; John and Oscar, living with the family. Mrs. Lucratia Broadwater, a daughter, resides on Love's farm near Lonaconing; Mrs. Harry Wilson, another daughter, at West Virginia Junction, and Mrs. Ambrose Fazenbaker, of New Germany. She leaves two brothers, George Sigler, of Elkins, W. Va., and Joseph Sigler, of Westernport; also a sister, Mrs. Rhoda Duckworth, of the same place. The funeral took place Tuesday at 10 o'clock a. m., with interment in the family cemetery nearby. Rev. John Green officiated.

MRS. MARY A. SHIRCLIFF.

Mrs. Mary A. Shircliff, widow of Honorious Shirchff, died at Gormania, W. Va., and was buried Thursday at Little Orleans, Allegany county. She was 71 years old. Requiem mass was celebrated in St. John's Catholic church, Gormania, by Rev. William A. O'Hara, of Keyser, before the funeral party left for Little Orleans. The surviving children are Leonard E. Shircliff, Elkins, W. Va.; Lawrence M. Shircliff, Mrs. H. C. Stemple, Austin L. Shircliff, Gormania; Mrs. N. C. Shrout, Wildell, W. Va.; William H. Shircliff, Westernport, Md., and Dr. James H. Shircliff, Blaine, W. Va.

Old Ice House Burned

Last Thursday night the old Nelson ice house located along the railroad track east of the water station caught or was set on fire and was completely destroyed. The building was of little value and has not been occupied for a number a years, consequently its loss is of little moment.

Mrs. Wade Hinebaugh, and two children, of Oakland, Md., and Miss Ida Guard, of Stephen City, Va., will leave this evening for Oakland after spending several day as the guests of Misses Blanche and Gertrude Guard.—Grafton Republican.

Garthright will have a car of strictly No. 1 corn and oats chop by Monday; also kiln-dried cracked corn and corn meal, and the very best winter wheat bran and fancy wheat middling which will be sold at the lowest cash or trade prices. 25-3t

Mr. E. W. Kelso, of near Mountain Lake Park, presented the editor with a number of extra fine peaches last Saturday afternoon. The fruit was grown by Mr. Kelso on his farm. The flavor was deliciously sweet and the size of the peaches eclipsed that of similar fruit grown in the peach belt of Maryland.

Mr. Frank E. Rathbun, of Piedmont, who recently returned from a tour of the west, came up to Oakland and Mountain Lake Park from his home last Saturday and spent the day with relatives and friends. Mr. Rathbun has entirely recovered from the slight injuries he received in the railroad wreck which occurred at Pebulo, Col., in which he and four others were hurt.

Mr. Gilead Miller, recently of Schell, W. Va., but now a resident of Bloomton, this county, vitised Oakland last Friday for the first time in twenty-five years where he met a number of old acquaintances and friends. Mr. Miller was very much gratified with the progress made by the county seat in the past quarter century and intimated that he would visit Oakland more frequently in the future.

Messrs. R. T. Browning and G. Semmes Hamill went to Baltimore Sunday night, returning to Oakland Tuesday morning. The visit of these gentleman to the city was in the interest of their respective friends for a place on the Democratic State Committee for the county. Mr. Browning is favorable to Mr. M. R. Hamill, while Mr. Hamill wants Mr. C. V. Gurrd appointed as the third member of the committee.

Mr. Noah Lichty of near Oakland, has received from the manufacturers a ditching machine similar to the one being used by Mr. William Tunny in making excavations for the water system of Oakland. The machine purchased by Mr. Lichty is very much smaller than Mr. Tunny's and will be used by him in trenching his farm and the glade lands of others residing in his section of the county. The machine will have a capacity of making a trench six inches wide and three to four feet deep.

Mr. Santy Smalley, of Kingwood, was in Oakland Tuesday, having come here from Deer Park, where he is the guest of his sister, Mrs. Calvin Savage. The brother and sister are twins and celebrated their seventieth anniversary Saturday. Mr. Smalley was a resident of Oakland up to the year 1868, when he moved to Preston county, where he has resided since. Notwithstanding the great lapse of time since he left Oakland Mr. Smalley met many of the old-time residents of the town and recognized them, renewing acquaintances formed nearly half a century ago.

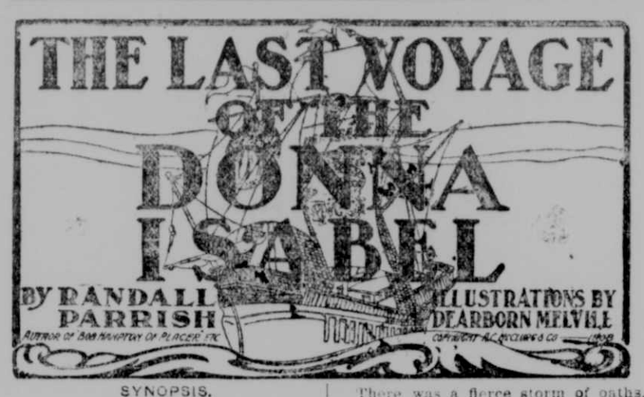
Proposals for Building Wrought Iron Bridge

Notice is hereby given that the County Commissioners of Garrett County, Maryland, will receive sealed proposals until

Tuesday, September 7, 1909,

at 1:30 o'clock p. m. at their office in the town of Oakland, Md., for the building of a low truss wrought iron bridge and concrete abutments. The superstructure to consist of one span 33 feet long and 14 feet wide. Said bridge is to be erected across Savage River near residence of C. Wilhelms. The bids submitted shall be for the superstructure seperate from the substructure and vice versa. Said bridge to be built according to the plans and specifications to be seen in the County Commissioners' office on and after September 1st, 1909.

The County Commissioners reserve the right to reject any and all bids.



By order of the Board.

KODAK SAFETY FILM

THE LAST VOYAGE OF THE DONNA ISABEL

SYNOPSIS.

CHAPTER I.—The story opens with the introduction of John Stephens, adventurer, a Massachusetts man imprisoned by authorities at Valparaiso, Chile. Being interested in mining operations in Bolivia, he was denounced by Chile as an insurrectionist and as a consequence was hiding. At his hotel his attention was attracted by an Englishman and a young woman.

CHAPTER II.—Stephens rescued the young woman from a drunken officer. He was thanked by her.

CHAPTER III.—Admiral of the Peruvian navy confronted Stephens, told him that war had been declared between Chile and Peru and offered him the office of captain. He desired that that night the Esmeralda, a Chilean vessel, should be captured. Stephens accepted the commission.

CHAPTER IV.—Stephens met a motley crew, to which he was assigned. He gave them final instructions.

CHAPTER V.—They successfully captured the vessel supposed to be the Esmeralda, through strategy.

CHAPTER VI.—Capt. Stephens gave directions for the departure of the craft.

CHAPTER VII.—He entered the cabin and discovered the English woman and her maid.

CHAPTER VIII. — Stephens quickly learned the wrong vessel had been captured, Lord Darlington's private yacht, the lord's wife and maid being aboard. He explained the situation to her ladyship.

CHAPTER IX.—Then First Mate Tuttle laid bare the plot, saying that the Sea Queen had been taken in order to go to the Antarctic circle.

CHAPTER X.—Tuttle explained that on a former voyage he had learned that the Donna Isabel was lost in 1753. He had found it frozen in a huge case of ice on an island and contained much gold.

CHAPTER XI.—Stephens, however, consented to be captain of the expedition. He told Lady Darlington. She was greatly alarmed, but expressed confidence in him.

CHAPTER XII.—The Sea Queen encountered a vessel in the fog. Stephens attempted to communicate, which caused a fierce struggle and he was overcome. Tuttle finally squaring the situation. Then the Sea Queen headed south again.

CHAPTER XIII.—Under Tuttle's guidance the vessel made progress toward its goal.

CHAPTER XIV.—De Nova, the mate, told Stephens that he believed Tuttle, now acting as skipper, insane because of his queer actions.

CHAPTER XV.—Stephens was awakened by crashing of glass. He saw Tuttle in the grip of a spasm of religious mania and overcame him. The sailor upon regaining his senses was taken ill.

CHAPTER XVI.—Tuttle committed suicide by shooting. Upon vote of the crew Stephens assumed the leadership and the men decided to continue the treasure hunt, the islands being supposed to be only 200 miles distant.

CHAPTER XVII.—Tuttle was buried in the sea, Lady Darlington pronouncing the service. Stephens awaking from sleep saw the ghost, supposed to have formed the basis for Tuttle's religious mania.

CHAPTER XVIII.—Upon advice of Lady Darlington, Stephens started to probe the ghost. He came upon Lieut. Sanchez, the drunken officer he had humbled in Chile. He found that at Sanchez' inspiration, Engineer McKnight played "ghost" to scare the men into giving up the quest.

CHAPTER XIX.—Stephens announced that the Sea Queen was at the spot where Tuttle's quest was supposed to be. The crew was anxious to go on in further search. De Nova and Stephens conquered them in a fist fight. Lady Darlington thanked him.

CHAPTER XX.—The Sea Queen started northward. She was wrecked in a fog. Stephens, De Nova, Lady Darlington and her maid being among those to set out in a life boat.

CHAPTER XXI.—Ten were rescued. Stephens saw only one chance in a thousand for life. Lady Darlington confessed her love to Stephens and he did likewise.

CHAPTER XXII.—Lady Darlington told her life story; how she had been bartered for a title, her yearning for absent love. She revealed herself as the school chum of Stephens' sister. She expressed a wish to die in the sea rather than face her former friends and go back to the old life. A ship was sighted.

CHAPTER XXIII.—The craft proved to be a derelict. They boarded her. She was frozen tight with hundreds of years of ice. Stephens found frozen bodies.

CHAPTER XXIV.—They accomplished the grewsome task of cleaning the cabin of the frozen bodies and rendering it fit for habitation. The vessel was the Donna Isabel, lost in 1753, 126 years previous.

CHAPTER XXV.—They read the log of the Isabel, which told how the Spaniards had died from cold, one by one. Lady Darlington sang to prevent the men from becoming moody.

CHAPTER XXVI.—The crew commenced the hunt for treasure. They found the iron chest, said to contain a part of 3,000,00 pesos, firmly imbedded in ice. Lady Darlington expressed the belief that it would never benefit the men, for she said the Donna Isabel would never reach port.

CHAPTER XXVII.—The men got a lust for gold. Stephens quelled it by whipping one. The Donna Isabel showed indications of sinking. They prepared to depart with what treasure had been found.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—The next morning they departed. Stephens went back to try to rescue Cole, a gold-crazed negro, who was hunting treasure in the hold. Stephens plunged into the icy sea a moment before the Donna Isabel sank. His mates rescued him, the negro being lost.

CHAPTER XXIX.—Exposure made nearly everyone but Lady Darlington and Stephens insane. He love for him kept him buoyed up through the terrible days and nights at sea in the open boat. One sailor jumped overboard his pockets laden with gold. Sanchez broke his leg. Stephens' mind became blank.

CHAPTER XXX.—Two days later they were rescued by a steamer. For three days Stephens hovered between life and death. Aroused to consciousness and finally health, he was told how Lord Darlington had been stabbed to death by Sanchez, who fleeing, joined the pirate party and died the day of the rescue. Stephens and Lady Darlington plighted their troth about, extended his hands, smiling, and said: "Sure, I'm comin', ol' pal," and stepped overboard. We grabbed for him, but he went down and never came up again. McKnight was the first to speak.

"He had his pockets full o' gold. I saw him takin' it las' night."

There was a fierce storm of oaths, the faces of the men wolfish and savage as they glared down into the water; but Kelly fell on his knees and began to pray.

It almost seems to me that this was the last, though it could not have been. There were hours after that, perhaps even days and nights, when I lived without really knowing that I lived. It was a period of fancies, phantoms, dreams, weird and fantastic, haunting horrors that left all reality blank. I know that Johnson helped me at the tiller while De Nova lay prone in the bottom of the boat, sometimes talking to himself, occasionally lifting his head to peer over the side. What he said had no meaning, just a jumble of French words, and he smiled like that dead Spaniard in the cabin of the Donna Isabel. I know that Sanchez, who had bravely done all he could in spite of his broken leg, fell into the delirium of fever, screamed for hours that he was dying, and had at last to be bound fast in his blankets. I know Kelly came creeping aft with a knife in his hand, imagining he had been robbed, and I had to knock him flat with the tillerbar, the boat falling off into the trough of the sea and nearly capsizing before I could get her head about again. Doris was bending over Sanchez, who seemed to have an interval of sanity at the moment—that was the last I remember; then, I think, I pitched over against Doris when she came back to me, and everything went dark.

CHAPTER XXX.

In Which We Come to the End.

I was lying between white sheets in a rather wide berth when I came again to consciousness, a yellow glow of sunlight streaming in through an open port, and the clanking sound of machinery in my ears. I closed my eyes again, wearily, my head reeling yet from the delusions of the past. No, this was real—a steamer, rising and falling on the swell, but pushing steadily forward to the rapid revolutions of the screw. I could hear the tramping of feet on deck, even the slush of the sea without. I opened my eyes again, watching a curtain wave to the fresh air rushing in through the port, and then I turned my head on the pillow. Doris sat on a low stool gazing out through the aperture on the sea, her face partially turned away. She looked pale, careworn, her eyes heavy and sad. Suddenly she turned her glance in my direction, and sprang up with a glad cry.

"Oh, Jack, you have been lying there so long unconscious!"

I could only clasp her hands and gaze into the depths of her gray eyes.

"I have proved rather a poor specimen of a man, I fear, dear," I confessed at last, ashamed of my weakness. "How long?"

"It is three days since we were brought on board, and we were a day and night in the boat after you lost consciousness."

I endeavored to think it out, to comprehend. She leaned farther over, her lips touching my cheek.

"Don't worry about it, Jack; everything is all right now. Johnson took your place at the tiller, and—and we were picked up."

"What vessel is this?"

"The El Cid, Valparaiso to Buenos Ayres—a coast-trader."

"And the others? Do they live?"

"All but Sanchez; he died the night after our rescue. Kelly is half crazed yet, but they think he will get over it. De Nova was very badly frozen, but Celeste was out on deck yesterday."

I lay there looking at her, striving valiantly to put all these horrors away, and to face the present and the future. My handclasp tightened, for I could no longer keep back the one question which trembled on my lips.

"But you, Doris, you! Do you still mean what you said yonder? Are we only saved to lose each other? Have you heard? Do you know anything of him?"

The red blood flooded the pale cheeks, the long lashes veiling the gray eyes.

"Oh, not now; don't speak of that now."

"But I must, I cannot wait in suspense," I insisted, lifting myself on the pillow. "You have heard—tell me."

"I—I have been a coward," she faltered. "I—I have not asked; I have not even told my name to those on board. I was afraid the knowledge might place all under arrest; besides I—I wanted to nurse you."

I looked at her, my heart failing, my voice trembling as I spoke.

"But—but are you going to—England?"

"Yes."

"When?"

There was a long pause, in which I heard her rapid breathing.

"They—they tell me I can get passage on an English vessel, the Albatross, within a few days after we reach Buenos Ayres."

Her hand tightened on mine, and she dropped to her knees, her face buried in the coverlet.

I fought the devil in me like a man, my hands clenched, my teeth set fiercely, but it was a while before I could control my voice sufficiently for reply. She did not lift her head, and as I continued to gaze at her my heart throbbed with a love which became sacrifice.

"Doris," I managed to whisper at last, "whatever you believe to be right I will think right also. Only let me be alone for a little while—just a little while, until I can fight this out and conquer."

She lifted her head, her hand on my hair, her gray eyes looking frankly into mine.

"I—I thank you, Jack," she smiled tremblingly. The next moment I was alone.

While I was sitting up and partially dressed that evening, Marsden, the chief mate, came in and told me briefly the story of our rescue.

"We were considerably to the west of our course," he said, gravely, "because we had met headwinds and a heavy sea all the way down the coast. It was just at daybreak when we sighted your boat in longitude 78 degrees west and latitude 53 degrees, 17 minutes south. I've been knocking about at sea for 20 years, Mr. Stephens, but I never saw a more pitiful sight than that longboat presented when we got up alongside. The jib held, but the mainsail was in tatters, and for a minute or two I didn't think there was a living soul aboard. There was a man forward lashed down with ropes, dead; a man and a woman were wrapped up in blankets amidships, leaning against each other, their eyes closed. Close up to the stern another woman was lying with her arms about your neck and hiding your face."

"Doris, with her arms about me!" I thought. How well I knew the desperation that could lead her to the embrace she had ever refused me! Marsden went on:

"A big fellow held to the tiller as if he was froze there, but he'd dropped down until his head hung dangling as the boat rocked. There wasn't one of them took any notice of us until we were fairly alongside. Then this big sailor lifted his head and stared dull-eyed like he thought he saw a vision, and when I spoke to him the woman that had her arms about you staggered to her knees and began to cry. Good Lord, sir, but it made my heart ache, and I never saw so much misery in any human face before. Well, we fell to, and got you all on the El Cid, hoisted the whole outfit over the rail, and, barring the dead man, I reckon you're all good for a spell of life yet."

"They told you our story?"

"Yes—most of it, anyway; and I understand all right what it was did you up so. It wasn't hunger or cold, but just the loneliness an' strain."

I looked away from him, out through the open port at the gray vista of sea.

"That was it, Mr. Marsden," I said, my voice shaking to the memory of it. "It was the hell of the great ocean—it broke our hearts."

As the El Cid sped on her way up the Patagonian coast my strength came rapidly back, and I soon found my way on deck, where, wrapped against the chill of the wind, I passed much time talking with Doris, seeing De Nova and Kelly now and then. Celeste was often with us, her eyes roguish as ever, but her face thin and white. Once, when we chanced to be left alone together, I undertook to question the girl.

"What is the matter between you and De Nova, Celeste? Have you two fallen out?"

She tossed her head, flashing her eyes at me.

"I not know we ever fall in," she said, pouting prettily. "He ver' nice for a sailor, but w'y do I want a sailor? I want ze sea no more ever."

"Yes, but De Nova can quit the sea."

"Non, non!" she cried, shaking her head roguishly, "I have a very good time wiz Mons. De Nova! he talk nice, he make love nice—but it is all over now."

"You mean you are going back to Europe?"

She shrugged her shoulders, her teeth gleaming.

"Oui, monsieur; I go wiz madam to London, to Paree; zare I have plaisir."

"But De Nova? How does he take it?"

"Pah! he get over it; I know ze sailor. See, monsieur; w'at I tell you?"

I glanced aft in the direction she pointed. Within the companion stood the debonair mate, his little black mustaches curled jauntily upward, his teeth merrily glistening, as he smiled down upon a rosy-cheeked damsel, whom I recognized as the stewardess. My companion patted her little foot on the deck.

"Pah! did I not tell you, monsieur? I know ze sailor."

She swept away with the swift movement of a bird, and I turned my face about to perceive Marsden standing silently beside me. He drew up a deck chair and sat down at my side. His grave face and manner led me to speak first.

"I have been wondering," I said, slowly, "whether you intend to report us as soon as you make land. No doubt you heard the story of the Sea Queen at Valparaiso, and have already guessed us to be the survivors of the crew of that yacht."

"Why, yes," stroking his beard; "we have no doubt as to that. We know little of the affair of the Sea Queen beyond what your man Kelly has told us, as we were up the north coast at the time. However, I do not think there will be anything gained by reporting your rescue immediately, for no one can care particularly about your arrest except possibly a British officer or such. The Chileans are still busy with their war, and the man who owned the yacht being dead—"

"You—you—mean Lord Darlington?"

"Yes; that is what I came here to tell you about. I have been waiting until you were strong enough to hear the story. I thought you were the one who ought to tell her." He paused doubtfully. "I understand she is Lady Darlington?"

"Yes," I answered, my voice trembling in my eagerness to comprehend fully. "But are you sure her husband is dead?"

"Regarding that fact there is no possible doubt, Mr. Stephens. We were in port at Valparaiso barely three hours, but long enough to hear a brief account of the affair. It seems Lord Darlington had in some way quarreled with or insulted a Chilean naval officer. This officer being on duty in the grounds of the presidente the night of the declaration of war, the two met again and renewed their quarrel. The officer was drunk and abusive, and his lordship drew a revolver. They were separated at that time by the guard, but an hour later the Englishman was found beside the fountain of the inner court dead from a knife-thrust in his back. His murderer disappeared instantly and most mysteriously."

"My God!" I exclaimed, dazed with the information. "It must have been Sanchez!"

"It must have been Sanchez," Marsden repeated, soberly. "He was fleeing from the crime when he ran into your party. It was his own haunting conscience that put the idea of the ghosts Kelly tells about into his head. You will tell her the story?"

"Yes," I said, not venturing to look into his face, realizing that he understood.

I sat there, it seemed for hours, endeavoring to muster up courage for my task as I watched, far in the distance, the darkening outlines of Cape Flores. At last I went slowly down the companionway into the cabin.

"But Now We Both Know."

Slowly and falteringly at first, but gaining control of my voice as I proceeded, I told her all, marking the pallor of her cheek, the horror in her eyes. For another age I sat silent, gazing across the deserted cabin out through an open port, afraid to disturb the motionless woman beside me. Finally my fingers, almost unconsciously, crept across the rail of the settee until they touched her own.

"Doris," I whispered, pleadingly, confused by her silence, "is it possible that you already knew this?"

She did not raise her bowed head, but I felt the soft pressure of her hand.

"Yes, Jack, I—I knew," she acknowledged, doubtfully. "Sanchez told me in the boat when he felt himself to be dying. It was then I came back and took you in my arms. But I couldn't tell you—I could not tell you. I felt that if we were saved you must learn it from other lips than mine."

"But now we both know."

She lifted her eyes suddenly, eyes misty with tears, and I realized the truth forever.

THE END.

Loaning Books.

You have in your library a set of books that you very much prize. The set is incomplete because a year ago a neighbor who has since removed to another city, borrowed two volumes and did not return them. Your first mistake was in loaning the books; your next, in not reclaiming after the lapse of two or three months. I would rather loan a complete set from my library than to break it by the loan of a single volume. One many always give a friend permission to come and read such a book in the room where it belongs. When anyone borrows a book and retains it indefinitely, a note should be sent, politely begging for its return. People do not borrow your clothing, jewelry or bric-a-brac, but, strangely enough, many persons display no reluctance in asking the loan of a book. You, of course, have your own exceptions; there are dear friends to whom books are precious, who know how to care for them and with whom it is a pleasure to exchange them at discretion.—Woman's Home Companion.

An Exception.

"Thus culinary journal states that all good cooks peel their onions under water," remarked the boarder who is always reading odd items.

"That's nothing unusual," laughed the comedian boarder. "I know a cook who peels his vegetables underwater."

"Ridiculous!"

"Not at all. He is cook on a submarine boat."

The Republican for Job Work.

BEST OF ALL SHADES OF BLUE.

The Clear, Vivid Tint Known as "Eugenie" Is Most Striking.

One of the new shades of blue which are calculated to carry all before them this season in the world of dress, and which have no rival even among the softer and more effective tones, which, according to the standard of yesterday, should have come first in order of merit, is the clear, vivid tint known as "Eugenie." This is the facsimile of the old-fashioned blue which in the days of the second empire was worn so frequently by the beautiful bride of Napoleon III., and which extended its popularity over a far longer period than is usually the case where fashion is concerned.

The only difference which obtains nowadays is that, instead of being carried out in the crisp rustling silks which our grandmothers delighted in, and of which the quality of "standing alone" appeared to have been rated above all others, it is reproduced in the softest crepe meteor, satin charmeuse or cashmere de soie, which gives a very quaint effect to this vivid and somewhat crude tone.

WEAR THE COAT SWEATER.

Snugly Fitting Garment That Affords Much Comfort.

The fashion for waistcoats has brought about a new sweater which is tight fitting and is made to show.

It is knitted in most of the fashionable colors and is smart in leather brown, jade green with a black border, bright blue with a striped border, and gray with a black edge and smoked pearl buttons.

These go by the name of coat sweaters. They are to be widely worn in the country life this season.

Any girl who suffers with cold should get one to put under her coat on the street. They fit so snugly that they do not disturb the shape of anything they are worn under.

Outside of the city they serve quite as well as a coat. They have long sleeves with turnover cuffs, flat revers and good-looking buttons.

They reach below the hips and usually have one or two pockets in front.

THE NEW COIFFURE.

The above cut shows the correct arrangement of the fashionable loose psyche. As will be noticed, the hair is almost flat on top, but stands out in large, loose waves on sides. A simple but pretty ornament is a bow of ribbon as indicated.

Spangled Scarfs.

The spangled or sequined scarfs are in great demand for neckwear, and the girl who is quick at spangling or beading can make one of these at little cost.

Buy figured, dotted, or ringed with gold beads or white, in a supple quality.

Outline each figure, dot or ring with gold beads or tiny sequins, and you will have the effect of the Syrian scarfs which cost from $15 to $20.

These are heavy and suitable for theater-goers of rather mature years.

The younger girl should content herself with a long, soft scarf of chiffon cloth or figured net, trimmed with lace, or, best of all, fine crepe de chine in delicate colorings.

The latter may have deep hems with the owner's monogram embroidered in self-tone on one end.

A Child's Bed.

The mattress for a child's bed should be firm and not too soft. If any pillow at all is used—and it is best not to have one—it should be a small pillow stuffed with hair. Never load the bed with blankets. Let the cover be light and warm. Also remove the counterpane, or heavy Marseilles coverlid, at night. Never let a child sleep on a feather bed. Children should sleep alone. Each child should have his own bureau and closet, or at least space in the closet, so that method and neatness may be installed from the first. Care should be taken that the child use his own hairbrush and washcloth.

Steel Ribs in Fur Neckwear.

The very latest notion is the "spring" collar, a smart strip of fur through which runs a thin, flexible rib of steel something like the steel bracelet which the bicycle enthusiast wears to keep his nether garments from flapping around his ankles. This new fur collar needs no snap or other fastening, for it springs into the right snugness around the throat. When the wearer is in a warm room the collar may be clasped around the arm, with less danger of losing it than when, as heretofore, it was held in the hand or on the lap.

Serge Remains Popular.

Serge is to retain its restored popularity, and in plain, herringbone and chevron weaves will be much in evidence among the new tailored costumes, as will the wide-wale diagonals, which gained a firm hold upon feminine fancy in the late spring season

Continuation of Paul's Third Journey

Sunday School Lesson for August 22, 1909

Specially Arranged for This Paper

LESSON TEXT.—Acts 19:23-20:1. Memory verse 26.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"He said unto me: My grace is sufficient for thee: for my strength is made perfect in weakness."—2 Cor. 12:9.

TIME.—A. D. 56 or 57, near the close of Paul's work at Ephesus.

PLACE.—The city of Ephesus.

Suggestion and Practical Thought.

Some Things with Which the Gospel Interferes. The Results.

Business Interests versus the Gospel.—Vs. 21-28.

Paul's Plans for the Future. For at least two years and three months Paul had been working in Ephesus and was about ready to go on extending Christianity even to Rome (see Rom. 1: 12; 15: 23), and on to Spain (Rom. 15: 24), after visiting and strengthening the churches in Macedonia and Greece, and bearing the gifts of Philippi, Thessalonica, Berea, Corinth and other Gentile churches (Rom. 15: 26) to the poor in Jerusalem.

In Corinth he expected to receive contributions for the poor in Jerusalem (1 Cor. 16: 1-4).

He sent two of his helpers, Timothy and Erastus (2 Tim. 4: 20), through Macedonia to Corinth (1 Cor. 4: 17-19) to prepare that church for his approaching visit. Paul succeeded in all these plans, but some of them were accomplished in a very different manner.

Paul "stayed in Asia for a season" (V. 22). Apparently for several weeks or months. From the fact that Asia is mentioned rather than Ephesus, its capital, it has been inferred that he did not remain in the city all the time, but labored in the outlying districts.

A Contrast. In our last lesson we saw how Christians voluntarily gave up a bad business, at great cost to themselves, for Christ's sake. Now we find some men who tried to destroy the Gospel because it was injuring their bad business.

"There arose no small stir," commotion, like the sea in a storm. "A certain man named Demetrius." Probably the head of the whole guild of shrine makers.

"Diana." The Ephesian Diana was a distinct goddess from the Greek Diana (the Latinized form of Artemis), who was a virgin, a huntress, a personification of the moon, as Apollo was of the sun. She was worshiped with the vilest debaucheries, as many of the heathen idols were, incorporating the lusts of the flesh in the very ritual of worship.

"Our craft is in danger," because "this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they be no gods, which are made with hands:" and this "throughout all Asia," the Roman province of that name, of which Ephesus was the capital. All the blessings of the Gospel, the uplift, the renovated character, the happiness and prosperity, and eternal salvation of the great mass of the people, weighed nothing against the money gains of a few men in a bad business.

This was in direct contrast with the character of the Christians, who made great sacrifices in burning their own (not other people's) bad books which were injuring the people.

The Mob in the Coliseum.—Vs. 29-41. "The whole city was filled with confusion." The mob of Ephesus made for the house of Aquila, with whom Paul was lodging. They missed their prey; but as Paul tells us that Aquila and Priscilla had for his life laid down their own necks (Rom. 16: 4), it is likely that these faithful friends, in shielding the apostle, brought themselves into the most imminent peril. The mob, though baffled of their principal aim, seized on Gaius and Aristarchus, two of Paul's associates, and dragged them away as criminals. "Rushed with one accord into the theater," the Coliseum, capable of holding 56,000 people.

Alexander the Jew. The Jews were always especially exposed to persecution, and as the mob would be likely to make no distinction between Jews and Christians, particularly as Paul was a Jew, they put forward a prominent Jew, named Alexander, to defend them.

The Mob Quelled. "The townclerk" at length interfered and argued with the excited people.

1. The worship of Diana was so settled in Ephesus that no company of Jews could overthrow it. You have no real cause for violence. "The image" of Diana "which fell down from Jupiter," their chief god, as meteoric stones fall from the sky.

Thus was peace and quiet restored.

The signs of these times meant that it was best for Paul to leave immediately for another field of labor, while Ephesus was settling down into quiet peace, and the church continued to grow in character and numbers. Therefore Paul bade the beloved church good-by and "departed for to go into Macedonia" (Acts 20: 1).

2. Paul had not committed the wrong with which he was charged. His converts had been very careful not to blaspheme the goddess. His method of overcoming idolatry is quite noticeable. The contrast between them and the teachings and character of the idol gods was the argument.

3. There was a better way of redress, if there were need, through the law courts.

4. There was danger that the Roman government might interfere and deprive a turbulent city of its greatly prized liberties.

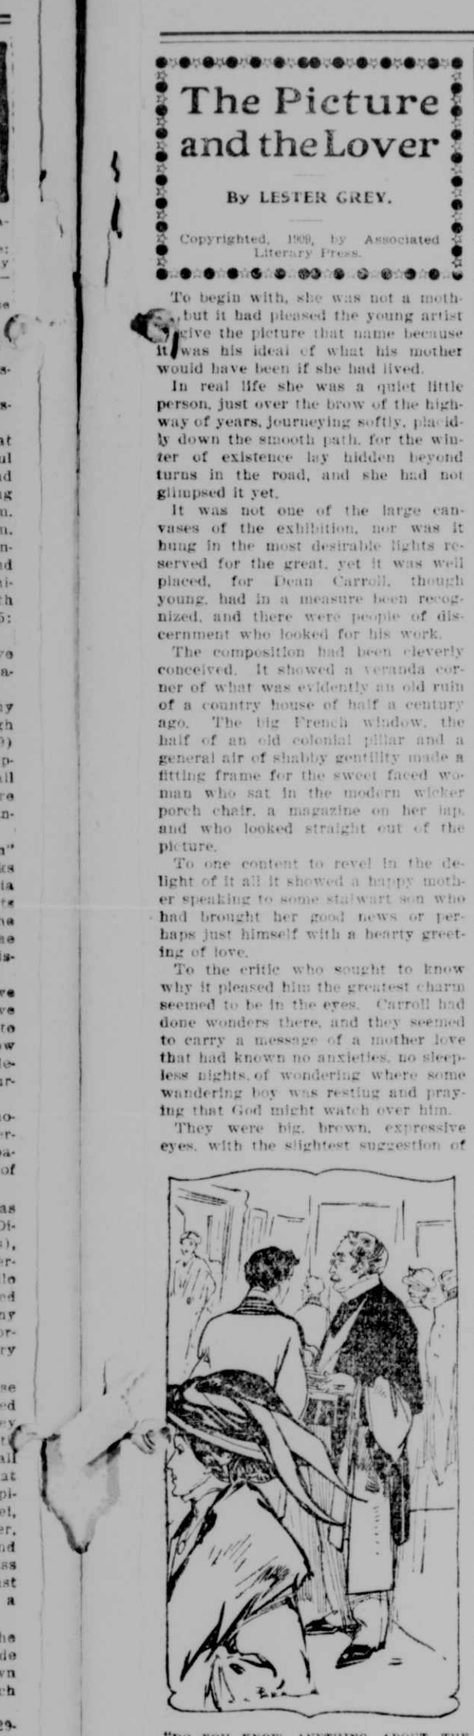
The Picture and the Lover

By LESTER GREY.

Copyrighted, 1909, by Associated Literary Press.

To begin with, she was not a mother, but it had pleased the young artist to give the picture that name because it was his ideal of what his mother would have been if she had lived.

In real life she was a quiet little person, just over the brow of the highway of years, journeying softly, placidly down the smooth path, for the winter of existence lay hidden beyond turns in the road, and she had not glimpsed it yet.



It was not one of the large canvases of the exhibition, nor was it hung in the most desirable lights reserved for the great, yet it was well placed, for Dean Carroll, though young, had in a measure been recognized, and there were people of discernment who looked for his work.

The composition had been cleverly conceived. It showed a veranda corner of what was evidently an old ruin of a country house of half a century ago. The big French window, the half of an old colonial pillar and a general air of shabby gentility made a fitting frame for the sweet faced woman who sat in the modern wicker porch chair, a magazine on her lap, and who looked straight out of the picture.

To one content to revel in the delight of it all it showed a happy mother speaking to some stalwart son who had brought her good news or perhaps just himself with a hearty greeting of love.

To the critic who sought to know why it pleased him the greatest charm seemed to be in the eyes. Carroll had done wonders there, and they seemed to carry a message of a mother love that had known no anxieties, no sleepless nights, of wondering where some wandering boy was resting and praying that God might watch over him.

They were big, brown, expressive eyes, with the slightest suggestion of wrinkled corners, a hint of age further carried out here and there in the hair by a touch of time's silver strands showing through the soft hued brown.

It attracted some attention from the writers, and friends told Carroll it was distinctly good. Otherwise it created no stir. It was one of half a hundred others equally creditable to the artists and would probably bring a decent enough sum when placed on sale.

Yet somehow Carroll liked to look at it, probably because it brought back to him memories of that Virginia summer when he feared he was close to death and of the gentle spinster who had nursed him past the crisis and mothered him through a happy convalescence.

His own mother had died when he was very young, and as he lay on his bed of illness watching her sweet face as she moved about the room it gave him joy to pretend that he was really her son, and it grieved him to think that perhaps years to come might be both lonely to her and full of trouble.

One afternoon when he stood half in a reverie of remembrance before the picture he was conscious that an elderly man near him was evincing more than usual interest.

He fumbled for his glasses, turned the leaves of the catalogue until he came to the number; then the eagerness died out of his face, and he turned away. But he came back and again looked upon it with no concealment of his appreciation.

The stranger noticed Carroll when he started away the second time and stopped to ask him:

"Do you know anything about the picture?"

"Why, yes, naturally, I painted it."

"You are Mr. Carroll, then. I was going to hunt you up. Is it for sale?" the older man inquired.

"Well, you know we artists have to live. Few of us paint for fame alone, so it is like the rest. Only I hope it goes to some one who will appreciate it. The circumstances of its painting are dear memories."

"Are you—are—you her—son? Tell me!" And the questioner put a trembling hand on the artist's shoulders.

"No," replied Carroll. "I wish I was, or, rather, if my own mother had lived I think she would have been like her."

"Can you spare me the time to tell me the circumstances you speak of—that is, if you will? Thank you, but not here. Let us go to my house. I live near." And he led the way out.

"It isn't much of a story except in its personal appeal to me," began Carroll a few moments later. "But I presume it reminds you of some one, and if the two women are alike I know you understand how fond I am of her.

"Last spring I was threatened with fever and was told to get out of the city. I found a quiet place owned by the original of the portrait, and she took me in. Unfortunately I did not escape soon enough, and the fever caught me. There was no one with her but an old servant, and I asked to be moved into the nearest town.

"She would not hear of it and nursed me on a journey to death's door and back again to the sunshine to the trees and the birds—and life. It is something that one cannot explain—her tenderness, her motherliness and the sense of comfort, of love even, for a stranger that she gave to me.

"Her entrance would light up my sickroom; her presence was better than all the medicine in the world. Frankly, she is the dearest, sweetest woman I have ever known. I was only two when my mother died. That's about all, I think."

"Mr. Carroll," his host began, "I have never met you, but am perhaps known to you. I am Judge Johnson Lee Carter, and I am from Virginia. When I was a hotheaded young man I was in love with a girl who is probably the double of the lady in your picture. I loved her devotedly, madly, sir, and she loved me. But I was headstrong, sir, and I quarreled with her one night and came north.

"All my life the years have been loveless except my love for her. Three, four, five years passed, and I knew she was probably married, so I have never inquired, but the picture, sir, brought it all back to me, all the years I have missed that might have been crowded with happiness, for they would have been happy ones. Mr. Carroll, sir, she was the finest lady on earth. Now you know why I want to buy your picture and"—

"Judge Carter, there can be no talk of buying and selling that picture after what you have told me. There, there; no one else will get it. The exhibition will last another month. You can get back from Albemarle county before that"—

"What are you saying, boy? Albemarle county? Why, that's where I lived. Is it Ruth? Is she a widow? Is she free, and is it"—

"Ruth Cressley, and she is not a widow," said Carroll quietly. "She has never married."

"Honest, boy? Honest? Forgive me, forgive me, Mr. Carroll. Then she didn't forget?"

"She is the sort who love once—for always, I think," and Carroll extended his hand.

"And the picture?" asked the judge.

"Will be my wedding present."

"God bless you, sir; God bless you," and there were tears in his eyes as he showed Carroll to the door.

Carroll is famous now and a few years older. Ask him the best thing he ever did and he will tell you "Mother." Perhaps you won't understand him, but Judge Carter knows, and Mrs. Johnson Lee Carter shares the knowledge.

The Masterpiece.

Alma Tadema, the artist, did not achieve fame at a single bound. He had a few ups to many downs before he was finally recognized as a painter of ability. In his student days one of his unsuccessful pictures was returned unsold by the committee of the Brussels exhibition of 1859. The subject was a house on fire, says the Associated Sunday Magazine.

Instead of a tirade against the stupidity or favoritism of the committee the artist asked his fellow students into his studio and invited them to jump through the canvas. He led the way by leaping head first through the oily flames.

A second unsuccessful effort was a large sized square picture that came back again and again to its creator's easel until at last he revenged himself upon it in a novel way by cutting the picture out of its frame and giving it to an old woman to use as a table cover.

There was some one at last to appreciate its excellence. The next time Alma Tadema saw the old woman she told him that it was "much better than those common oilcloth things. They always let the water through," she explained, "but that one of yours is a good thick one, with plenty of paint on it."

Chasing the Polar Bear.

A polar bear chase is not very dangerous if one has coolness of mind and a good gun. Taking everything into account, it is easier properly to wound a bear than to catch a rabbit between hedges, because in spite of his ferocity the bear knows very little about defending himself against man, armed as man is nowadays. Besides, the arctic bear does not recognize man as such and takes him, for the most part, for a seal. The pilot among the hunters, perched in his crow's nest on the mast of the vessel and provided with a huge telescope, can distinguish in clear weather a bear five kilometers off or farther, so the hunter has time to watch his prey and to prepare his plan of attack. One can have splendid hunts on the icebergs as well. Sometimes the bear takes to the water to escape. In this case he is lost, for he cannot swim as quickly as a boat can follow, and the hunter can kill him almost without running any risks. It is a fact worthy of remark that one ball will do it if well placed—that is to say, placed in the head. Many bears after being shot in the heart have swum 100 or 200 meters.

HIS ROYAL NIBBS,

Some Tales to Show You Can't Get the Better of the King.

THE BIGGEST CONCH SHELL.

That's What His Majesty Calls Himself as He Orders Secretary Murphy to Issue Important Proclamation Concerning His Power.

[Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.]

One morning after his royal nibbs had spent an hour walking in the palace gardens with a number of his courtiers he entered his audience chamber and yelled for Murphy, his royal secretary, to come into his presence. Murphy soon appeared on the hustle and was greeted with:

"See here, you Irishman from Cork, I want to ask you a plain question and have a straight answer. Am I the biggest thing on this earth today?"

MURPHY SHOOK HIS HEAD IN A DOUBTFUL WAY AND RETIRED TO ISSUE THE PROCLAMATION.

"Why, there are mountains rather larger than your majesty," was the hesitating reply.

"I'm not talking about mountains, but men. Am I or am I not the biggest conch shell on the beach?"

"The powers of your majesty seem unlimited."

"That's what my courtiers have been telling me. That fellow Schermerhorn says that if I commanded the sun to stand still it would surely obey me. Do you agree with him?"

"Y-e-s, in a way, but if I were you I would not try it. I'd be satisfied to command the people to pay more taxes."

"Look here, Murphy," said the king, who didn't at all like the other's conservative way, "I'm either a devil of a fellow or I'm a plug of a man. I propose to find out which. I want you to issue a proclamation in my name that on the 13th of the month I am going to order the sun to stand still for two hours."

"But, your majesty, the sun has always had ideas of his own. He doesn't take orders from even kings. If he refuses to stand still at your orders you will be left in a hole."

"Never you mind the hole, but go ahead. Bid all the subjects of my realm knock off work between the hours of 2 and 4 and see the sun obey my mandate."

Murphy shook his head in a doubtful way and retired to issue the proclamation, and for the next week he was looking ahead to the loss of his job. He tried to dissuade the king from carrying out the scheme, but in vain. The day and the hour came, and the whole nation looked at the sun. Every one saw that it moved along in spite of the proclamation, and the pale faced secretary finally went to the king and said:

"I told you not to do it, but you persisted."

"But what is wrong now, old kicker?" smiled the king.

"Why, the sun is moving. Hang it, I believe it is moving faster than usual. You have made a grand fiasco of it, and from this on the people will decry your power."

"Murphy, old boy, you are a chump. I pay you 10,000 sequins a year for backing me up and furnishing me fresh ideas, but you are not worth 15 cents."

"But the sun moves, your majesty," protested Murphy.

"Of course it does."

"And the people see it move."

"Of course they do."

"Then—then"—

"Then you issue a royal proclamation stating that the sun stood still for the two hours named and offering a reward of a thousand sequins to any one who saw it move."

"But half a million people will claim the reward, your highness."

"Will they? Murphy, you have been with me for five years, but you don't know your boss yet. Attach to that proclamation a P. S. stating that any subject who says the sun moved when his king says it didn't gets 500 strokes of the bamboo on the soles of his feet and loses his head besides. You'll find every man in my dominions swearing that the sun stood still and didn't set until two hours after the usual time. How's that for high?"

"O ruler of the sea and land, you are great stuff—great stuff!" exclaimed the delighted Murphy, and he retired in good order to hang on to his job.

The King and the Peasant.

On a certain occasion Murphy, the king's royal secretary, entered his master's presence with a paper in his hand, and his nibbs looked up from the novel he was reading and queried:

"Well, what is it this time?"

"A petition, your majesty, from the inhabitants of the village of Crow Corners. The male inhabitants number fifty, and every one has signed it."

"Do they want their taxes remitted?"

"Nay, your highness. Their village, as perhaps you may recall, is situated on the hither side of Long hill. Owing to the steepness of this hill the villagers can only put half a load on their asses when coming to market. They complain that this is a great hardship to them, and we must see that it is so."

"Yes, it's easy to see that, and you go out there this afternoon and see what can be done about it. I want my people to understand that they have only to appeal to me to have anything righted. Spread it on as thick as you can about my being a fatherly sort of chap and looking upon them as my children."

Murphy rode out to the village and had an audience with the people, and upon his return he reported to the king:

"The state of affairs is as described in the petition, O highness. The hill is a mile long and a half mile high, and the stoutest of asses can hardly carry a pack of fifty pounds."

"Well, what are you going to do about it?"

"The only thing than can be done is to grade the hill down to the level of the highway."

"And the cost?"

"Something like a million sequins."

"Jerusha! What did you promise the villagers?"

"That I would report to you and that in your love and wisdom you would do the right thing. I don't see how you are going to do it, though. We can't spare a tenth part of that money."

"Murphy," said the king after looking at him for a long minute, "you are an Irishman, aren't you?"

"The same, O king."

"And you came right from Cork to take this job?"

"I did."

"Well, you've got the thickest head of any Irishman I ever met up with. I often wonder why I pay you 5,000 scudi a year."

"You don't, O ruler. You simply agreed to pay that sum."

"It amounts to the same thing in the king business. If I was to pay you every month I should borrow your salary, and you would be no better off. As to this hill question, however, it's a wonder to me that you couldn't see the proper and only thing to do."

"But I thought I did, your highness."

"Shucks! Here are about a hundred villagers living on the farther side of a long, steep hill. That hill is a nuisance and a detriment to them."

"And must be graded down, your majesty."

"There's your thick skull again. It's a wonder to me how you ever found your way around your native town. I want you to go back to Crow Corners tomorrow and burn every house to the ground."

"Your majesty!"

"And when the last one has been consumed tell the people to found a new village on this side of the hill. That does away with the hill so far as they are concerned, and we don't have to pay out a cent for grading. See? Go soak your head, old man, and take a few lessons in running the king business." M. QUAD.

Too Suggestive.

They were blissfully sailing among the clouds.

"Dearest," he whispered, "I love you better than the stars love the night."

But the beautiful girl only laughed.

"What!" he demanded, somewhat piqued. "Do you doubt me?"

And she laughed again.

"How can I help it, George? Isn't this a 'hot air' balloon?"—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

All He Could Do.

"You said last week, sir, that you would raise my salary."

"So I did, and it was all I could do. I don't know where I'm to raise it this week."—New York Herald.

AGHSAN OR TURKISH STEW.

Something New for Those Who Are Tired of Every-Day Cooking.

And now if you wish to try a new dish, and at the same time dispose of the fat sprawling purslane that is running over your garden beds and paths, let me recommend the dish which Philip, my most faithful and competent Armenian helper, assures me is "God's medicine," and will "save a good many doctor's bills."

The Italians, I find, are also very fond of it, and it is really very tasty. In Turkey, Philip says, the purslane is cultivated and grows much larger and more succulent. It is in great demand as a salad plant.

This is the way he cooked it for dinner the other day. A half peck of "pussley" was looked over most carefully, then thoroughly washed. It was then put in a saucepan with a little cold water. Cook half an hour (if very young it will not take quite so long). Meantime take three large or four small onions, cut in dice and brown in a frying pan with butter, olive oil or good drippings. Philip used the olive oil. Five minutes before the purslane is ready, add the onions and salt and pepper to taste. This was served hot as a prelude to the dinner instead of soup. Dandelions are served in the same way, and, like purslane, are "God's medicine" and natural purifiers.—Washington Star.

RECIPE FOR CURRIED MUTTON.

Makes Pleasant Change from the Usual Roast or Boiled.

Get the breast of mutton, have the butcher chop the bones up small then cut it up into small pieces, fat, gristle and all; put into a pan and wash it. Then, considering the meat weighs 3½ pounds, put a quarter pound of butter into the pot and let it cook. Slice two small onions into the butter and cook until brown. Then stir into it 1½ dessertspoonfuls of curry powder and a half cupful of shredded cocoanut. Next put in the meat, add hot water enough to cover and stir all well together, salt to taste, let boil one hour slowly, then draw back and simmer for two hours longer, or until all the water has evaporated. Chicken or any other meat may be done the same way. Next boil two cupfuls of rice in boiling salted water for about 20 minutes, strain and let cold water run over it to separate the kernels. Then put over hot water to steam for a few minutes. Heap round the sides of the dish and put the curry in the center.

Feather Cake.

Seven eggs, save whites for icing; 1½ cups sugar, three cups flour, one cup water, one-fourth cup chocolate, three teaspoonfuls baking powder, one tablespoon butter, one teaspoon of allspices, ground cinnamon, ground nutmeg, ground cloves and allspice, one teaspoon extract vanilla. Mix first butter and sugar, then yolks, then add chocolate and spices, then the flour, then the well-beaten whites of four eggs, then extract of vanilla. This makes a three-layer cake. Put together with boiled icing and chopped walnuts. One cup sugar, one half-cup water, one half teaspoonful of vanilla. Boil until it threads. Beat two eggs thoroughly and add icing while beating well; then put nuts on layers over icing.

Children's Cookies.

One cup sugar, one-half cup butter, two eggs well beaten, one-third cup sweet milk. Flavor with nutmeg, and add flour in which has been sifted two teaspoonfuls good baking powder. Have dough soft as can be conveniently handled, and after cutting sprinkle with granulated sugar and bake quickly. Before all the dough has been used, cut with knife a fine "cookie baby" for each child in the family. If you are so unfortunate as to have no little children in the house, then bake "cookie babies" for your neighbor's children, especially if the neighbor is poor and her children look hungry.

To Prevent Lint Sticking.

When pieces of felt are pasted to the bottom of ornaments that are to stand on a polished surface, care must be taken that the surface is not damp or the varnish fresh, or the lint from the felt will stick to the wood and be worse than the scratch.

This happens quite often in the slides of old mahogany desks. The unsightly mark on the top can only be removed by scraping gently with a piece of fine sandpaper and then rubbing up with sweet oil and vinegar. Do not scrape hard or the varnish will be scored and the surface of the mahogany be ruined.

To Wash a Silk Blouse.

Make a nice lather with soap and lukewarm water and a teaspoonful of borax. Do not rub the blouse, but souse it up and down in the water until all dirt is removed. Rinse through clean cold water, and afterwards rinse again in lukewarm water to which has been added a tablespoonful of methylated spirit. Hang in a shady place, and when nearly dry iron on the wrong side with a cool iron. If done carefully it is almost impossible to tell it from new.

To Keep Eggs from Bursting.

Eggs when boiling frequently burst. This is caused by their being too full of air, and may be prevented by pricking one end with a needle before putting them into the water. This makes an outlet for the air.

Scotch Stew.

Fry one large onion brown in lard or drippings. Remove seeds from four peppers and fry with onion and five large tomatoes. Season with salt. Let cook until tomatoes are well done. Serve hot.

WITH THE ELEPHANT FLEET.

Indian Coasting Steamers That Transport Largest of All Animals.

Its elephant fleet is one of the strangest and most deadly departments maintained by the British government in India. It is a large fleet of coasting steamers specially built for the transport of elephants.

India's population is one-fifth that of the entire globe. All these people use elephants. They use them for draught work and for tiger-hunting, and in the arenas of the native states they even pit them against one another and against wild beasts. The elephant fleet transfers the animals from Dacca, the trapping and training headquarters, to the various districts whence comes the demand.

To get an elephant aboard ship is a difficult and dangerous task. The animal must wade through the surf to a stout raft, and this unknown surf, so white and tumultuous, often terrifies and maddens him. If in his fury he slaughters a mahout or two, he cannot be greatly blamed.

Once on the raft, his legs are tied to pegs, and the slow sail to the ship is uneventful. But now a great band must be arranged under the elephant's belly, and a crane must hoist him up some twenty or thirty feet to the deck. Here again the elephant cannot be set down as intractable if, losing his head in that unprecedented aerial journey, he murders some more mahouts.

Very prosperous, albeit stained a little with mahouts' blood, the elephant fleet for many years has plied up and down the Indian coast, embarking and disembarking its heavy unmanageable freight.

INGERSOLL'S TRIBUTE TO LOVE.

First Dress of Immortality; Fills the World with Melody.

Love is the only bow on life's dark cloud. It is the morning and evening star. It shines on the babe, and sheds its radiance on the quiet tomb. It is the mother of art; inspirer of poet, patriot and philosopher. It is the air and light of every heart; builder of every home; kindler of every fire on the hearth; it was the first dress of immortality. It fills the world with melody, for music is the voice of love. Love is the magician, the enchanter that changes worthless things to joy, and makes right royal queens and kings of common clay. It is the perfume of that wonderful flower, the heart, and without that sacred passion, that divine swoon, we are less than beasts; but with it—earth is heaven and we are gods.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

Whistling on Sabbath in Scotland.

Concerning the Scottish reprobation of whistling on the Sabbath, Dean Kramsay has a characteristic story. A famous Glasgow artist met an old Highland acquaintance unexpectedly. "Donald, what brought you here?" "Ou, weel, sir, it was a baad place yon; they were baad folk—but they're a God fearin' set o' folk here." "Well, Donald, I'm glad to hear it." "Ou, ay, sir, deed are they; an' I'll gie ye an instance o't. Last Sabbath just as the kirk was skailin' there was a drover chield frae Dumfries comin' along the road whistlin', an' lookin' as happy as if it was ta middle o' the week. Weel, sir, oor laads is a 'God fearin' set o' laads, an' they were just coming oot o' the kirk 'od they yckit upon him an' a'most killed him!'"

Why She Wasn't Disturbed.

His family is taking in the opera in New York and he had entertained at cards—American fashion—until the rumbling of the early cars put an end to the game. In fact, he just refreshed himself with a bath, and when he came down to breakfast his heart smote him.

"I hope the gentlemen didn't disturb you last night with their noise," he said to the maid, when she served his breakfast. "I'm sure they didn't mean to be quite so noisy."

"La, sir," was her reply, "I 'aven't slept in the 'ouse since missus went away. I slept at me sister's, sir."

The joke was too good to keep, and that's why the coal trade learned of it the same day.—Cleveland Leader.

Getting Even with Papa.

Small Bobbie, in describing occurrences at kindergarten, was sometimes inclined to exaggeration. On such occasions a favorite remark of his father's was: "You would better reduce that statement to a minimum, Bobbie."

One evening when several aunts and uncles were present Bobbie's father was relating, with great fervor, his experiences on a recent fishing trip. After he had finished, Bobbie, assuming a very grave and important air, said: "Better reduce that to a min—min—peppermint, papa."

To Remove a Felon.

The following clipped from the London Lancet is a relief from bone felon: "As soon as the disease is felt put directly over the spot a fly blister about the size of your thumb nail, and let it remain for six hours, at the expiration of which time, directly under the surface of the blister, may be seen the felon, which can be instantly taken out with the point of a needle or a lancet."

Three Thousand Years.

"I think from the utensils about him that this mummy must have been an Egyptian plumber."

"It would be interesting to bring him to life."

"But too risky. Who's going to pay him for his time?"

STOYER.

We are sorry indeed to learn of the death of Mr. Fred Newell, of Blaine W. Va. Mr. Newell was a citizen of our village four or five years, and we learned to know him well and respect him highly.

Capt. James W. White was in town Friday. We are always glad to see "The Captain" around, for he is a well read man and a conversation with him is always instructive, and interesting as well.

J. T. Steyer spent Thursday in Blaine, W. Va., and Kitzmiller, this county.

Johnny, the six year old son of Thomas Nelvin, seriously injured his left foot by stepping on a rusty nail, which pierced almost entirely through the foot.

Mr. W. D. Shrout, one of our hustling farmers, was in town Wednesday, enjoying a day off, resting from the strenuous labors of the harvest season.

A number of our young men attended the grange entertainment at Kearney Tuesday night. They all have faith in the Oak Grove Grangers, but think they did not do their best Tuesday night.

One day last week W. T. Steyer brought to some of our sick folks a large boquet of real water lilies. Mr. Steyer grows these lilies on his farm. They are rare flowers, no such being found anywhere else in the county, and it is doubtful whether that particular variety is found anywhere else south of the Great Lakes.

News is scarce this week. Maybe something unheard-of or never-to-be-forgotten will happen that we can write about next week.

BITTINGER.

The first rain of any consequence that has fallen in this section for several weeks came early this week and it is hoped that the precipitation will be in season to prevent a total failure in the buckwheat crop, as many farmers feared as a result of the continued dry weather.

G. W. Engle, of Baltimore, spent last Sunday with his family at this place.

Rev. Alvin Yugel, pastor of the Lutheran congregation in this village, has been granted a vacation by the church council and he will spend a few days with friends in Eastern Maryland.

Mr. and Mrs. John Beitzell were shopping in Grantsville last Monday.

We are glad to report the recovery of Harvey Stark from his recent attack, which was reported last week.

Lee Beachy, of Grantsville, was in this section last week taking photographs for some friends.

Miss Mary Wiley returned to Piedmont last Monday after spending a week with her parents at this place.

Prof. J. C. Beahm is arranging to move his family to this village early in September, as he will be in charge of our school for the approaching school year.

Mrs Irvin, of Oakland, spent a few days with relatives here recently.

Fought on Passenger Train.

Two men who are engaged in laying gas mains at Terra Alta boarded the night accommodation at Oakland Sunday evening, and when about a half mile from that place engaged in a fight. One of the men—the larger man of the two—it seems, addressed a slighting remark to a female passenger aboard which was taken up by his companion, a much smaller man, but who had plenty of fight in him. The disturbance was settled by passengers who interfered and it was thought that the trouble was all over. Shortly thereafter, however, the smaller man stood up in the aisle of the coach, deliberately removed from his inside pocket a revolver, loaded it, then placing it in his hip pocket addressed the passengers and told them to keep out of the fight or he would use his revolver on them.

Thereupon the men went at it again and notwithstanding that the conductor and brakeman were summoned the smaller man proceeded to punish the larger man in a fearful manner. The coach was pretty well crowded and there were many lady passengers, who were of course greatly frightened. The train was finally stopped and the man with the revolver was persuaded to get off the train, but when he got off the train he vowed vengeance, saying he would go to Terra Alta and shoot the man he had just licked, and would do it yet that night. The names of neither of the two men could be learned by the passengers.—Grafton Republican.

McHENRY.

The farmers at this place are still gathering in their oats.

Miss Elinor Hinebaugh spent last Sunday evening with Miss Sarah Savage.

Mr. Robert Niner left McHenry last Friday for Uniontown where he expects to remain for a while.

Miss Esther Hinebaugh is visiting her aunt, Mrs. Lou Hoye, at Sang Run.

Not seeing anything of the hack for quite a while we suppose it is on the retired list.

Mr. Russell Lowdermilk spent last Sunday afternoon at the home of Jonas Glotfelty.

Mr. Calvin Cuppett, of Mountain Lake Park, spent Sunday at the home of George Glotfelty.

Mr. John Savage attended a party at Sang Run last Saturday evening.

Mr. L. S. Enlow, of Sang Run, passed through here in his new automobile last Saturday. BLUE JAY.

FROM ANOTHER CORRETPONDENT.

The rain Sunday which was so much needed did lots of good to growing crops and pastures.

Oats harvest is well on the way at this writing.

The Red Brush Lumber Co. has started up full blast after having been shut down on account of no water.

C. M. Glover is busily engaged building a new school house near S. F. Sebold's farm.

Quite a number of the people of this place attended church at Flatwood Saturday evening.

Miss Ruth DeLawder and Claude Loudermilk were seen driving through our village Sunday evening.

Mr. Robert Niner, who has been engaged harvesting for Jonas Glotfelty, has returned to his home near Gibbon Glade, Pa.

Mr. Calvin Cuppett and children have been visiting relatives in this section for a few days.

Mr. Russell Loudermilk, of Gap Run, was calling on his sister, Mrs. George Glotfelty, Sunday last.

Mr Fred Smith, who has been working for the Bond Lumber Co., was visiting his parents at this place, but has now gone to Alexander, W. Va., to be employed by the same company.

Some very large specimens of rattle snakes have been killed near here this season.

Misses Anna and Georgia Loudermilk was calling on the Misses DeLawder at their grandfather's one day last week.

Mrs. Hostettler, of near Oakland, was visiting in McHenry Saturday last.

Brison Glotfelty and wife were at Accident Saturday having some dental work done by Dr. Keller.

Samuel Welch, who has been attending school in Cumberland, has been visiting his sister, Mrs. H. Brenneman, and returned to his home in Mt. Lake Park accompanied by H. Brenneman and family Sunday last.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

Is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

ASSEMBLYMAN LAWRENCE F. GRENN WAS ARRESTED

Charged With Having Criminally Libelled Mr. H. J. Speicher.

Last Thursday morning Justice of the Peace A. S. Teats issued a warrant for the arrest of Lawrence F. Green, of Grantsville, in connection with the publication and circulation of a defamatory circular attacking the character of Mr. Harvey J. Speicher, Republican nominee for State Senate.

The warrant was placed in the hands of Sheriff Brown for service and on Saturday his deputy went to Grantsville where Green's arrest followed on Sunday morning, the deputy having arranged with Green by telephone to meet him at a certain place along the road between Grantsville and Jennings. The two men arrived here Sunday afternoon about two o'clock and Green was detained at the sheriff's residence until later in the day when Messrs. Ralph Engle and Gideon Hersbberger, both of Grantsville, arrived in town and entered into a bond for Green's appearance at the Circuit Court, he having waived a hearing before the Justice.

The arrest of Mr. Green followed as a natural sequence to the confession made previously by Mr. M. E. Frazee, of Friendsville, who was also arrested on the same charge and in connection with the circular above referred to. Mr. Frazee, who was also held under a Federal warrant, had his hearing before the Commission in Cumberland last Monday and was discharged from custody upon the representations of Mr. Speicher and Dr. Ravenscroft, who interceded for him.

Good Homes Desired.

J. Ed. Kildow, humane officer at Elkins, W. Va., desires to secure good homes for a number of children now in the Children's Home in his city. Ages run from two to 12 years. These children will be placed only in good homes as members of the family, and not as servants. A rigid investigation of the homes applying for children will be made before a child is placed, and only good homes accepted.

Applications must be made upon blanks furnished by Mr. Kildow upon request. Those desiring children should write to Mr. Kildow at Elkins, W. Va.

All Day Picnic.

An all day picnic will be held at the Pleasant Valley U. B. church on September 4th for the benefit of the church. Ice cream and refreshments of all kinds will be on sale during the day and at night a box supper will be held. All are invited.

A NEW POLITICAL BOSS.

A Correspondent of the Cumberland Times Unearths Him at Coney.

At the weekly meeting of the Grievance Club, an organization at Lonaconing, Wm. A. Garnett, a newspaper man of that city reports to the Cumberland Times the following as having occurred at the last meeting of the club and brings to light a new political firmanent hailing from somewhere in Garrett county, presumably close by Lonaconing where transpire many peculiar things. In his report of the meeting of the club Mr. Garnett, introducing the Garrett countian to the public, says:

Business Reed came in about this time with Sim Hamilton, of Garrett county. Sim needed no introduction to the Club, and was given a seat beside the Squire. After the Committee on Commerce had been instructed, Sim was asked to make a speech.

Sim talked of Garrett county politics. "I tell you what, gentlemen," said Sim, "those farmers out there don't know as much about politics as a potato bug knows about gastritis. I told them that they didn't need to elect delegates to anything. I'd represent them. I could run the whole thing if they'd let me. I went to Baltimore and Governor Crothers turned me down cold. I tried to make a speech and the Governor made me sit down. That man Crothers don't understand me.

"While I was in Baltimore I heard the big guns firing at the forts in the harbor. I asked a policeman what they were shooting for, and, says he: 'They are saluting Sim Hamilton, Governor of Garrett county. That's a governor's salute they're firing.' I tell you, gentlemen, that made me proud, and I goes back to Mr. Crothers and says I, 'do you hear those guns? They're saluting Sim Hamilton, from Garrett.'"

"Mr. Hamilton," said the Governor, "you're an exaggerated ego, you are afflicted with cranial hypertrophy. Go home and wash your neck."

"Gentlemen, I submit this was harsh treatment. That man Crothers will find that Sim Hamilton, the boss of Garrett county, cannot be insulted with impunity. If he stands for re-election I'll carry Garrett county against him. He won't get a vote there. I want you to understand that Sim Hamilton ain't to be sneezed at."

When Sim was done the Charter Member looked him over and said he: "Say, misther, don't you iver take anything for that throuble? Have you bin that way very long?"

Jaw Broken.

THE REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION YESTERDAY

Mr. Frank E. Williams, of Cecil County, For Comptroller.

BALTIMORE, MD., Aug. 25.—Unanimity of purpose and harmony reigned at today's Republican State Convention, held in the Maryland Theatre, so that the making of the platform and the selection of a candidate for State Comptroller was consummated with the least possible confusion. Frank E. Williams, of Cecil, was named as the party candidate to oppose Dr. Joshua W. Hering, of Carroll, the nominee of the Democratic party. Congressman Sydney E. Mudd was absent, being sick in a hospital, while ex-Congressman Wm. H. Jackson is laid up at his home. Congressman George A. Pearre, who was regarded as a possible insurgent, was present, but with no fire of battle in his eye. He was docile and complacent and had evidently come to the convention prepared to accept at the hands of those in control, whatever was handed out to him. Any ideas he may have had as to opposing that part of the platform relative to increased representation for Baltimore, did not find expression, the congressman from the Sixth being silent on the subject.

The theatre was crowded with delegates from Baltimore city and the counties, in addition to hundreds of other interested parties, when chairman John B. Hanna called the meeting to order, setting forth that the party stands as a bulwark against the designs of the Democratic party in its efforts to pass the disfranchisement amendment. Mr. Hanna said that the Republicans hoped to work for a just representation for Baltimore city and the counties, and shortly afterwards Thomas Parran was nominated as chairman by Congressman Pearre.

Mr. Parran was elected chairman unanimously and amid great enthusiasm.

In his speech Col. Pearre denounced the Democratic party and scathingly arraigned its leaders. He attacked the suffrage amendment and predicted its defeat.

Pearre, in closing his speech, declared that the plan for representation for Baltimore City according to population would be accepted very gracefully by the Allegany delegation, although this assertion was in no wise in accord with its original opinion.

Congressman Pearre, John P. Hill, of Baltimore, and E. M. Allen, of Harford county, escorted Mr. Parran to the chair. Mr. Parran made a characteristic speech in which he ridiculed the Democratic plank and the suffrage amendment.

The making of a platform proved an easy task. It is along the line of the platform adoped by the Republicans of Baltimore city when they held their Legislative conventions a few days ago. Nothing seems to be lacking however, in the pledge it makes for greater Legislative representation for Baltimore city.

The paramount issue is made the disfranchisement amendment. It contains the Just Representation League bill for city representation and an income tax plank; a public utilities plank and a denunciation of the Democratic State and city administrations, as well as of the good roads commission. A reassessment plank is incorporaned and the entire platform was adopted without a dissenting voice.

The nomination of the candidate for State comptroller followed. Ex-State Senator H. M. McCullough nominated Frank E. Williams, of Cecil county and he was unanimously chosen as the candidate.

The platform adopted by the convention was as follows:

We the representatives of the Republicans of Maryland, in Convention assembled, realized that no national issues are involved in the present campaign in this State, except in so far as the attempt to adopt an un-American suffrage system in one State of the Union may effect the common sisterhood of the States of the Union.

Republicans in Maryland claim help from all good citizens, whatever their politics or party, from all sincere friends of honest government and pure politics, in defeating the proposed amendment to our State Constitution, which we accept as the paramount issue in this campaign. Like the amendment rejected by the people four years ago, this measure would make of Maryland a one-party State, subject, with no hope of rescue, to the misrule of those selfish and unscrupulous men, long supreme in the Democratic party organization, against whose methods and aims thousands of Democrats have again and again protested at the polls.

We charge the present Democratic State administration with gross inefficiency and mismanagement. We point to the last session of its Legislature which has been marked by unprecedented extravagance, by the most shameless multiplication of useless State employees at the public expense, by a brazen refusal to even respectfully consider the recommendations of economical procedure, offered by Governor Warfield in his retiring message.

We point to the record of the Democratic city administration in Baltimore, where exposures of lax business methods and notorious scandals have followed in rapid and startling succession; notably the defalcation in the City Register's office, resulting in the loss of nearly $70,000 of the people's money.

We solemnly declare that we will do all in our power to have passed by the next Legislature, and thereafter adopted by the people of the State, a constitutional amendment whereby Baltimore city shall have 52 members of the House of Delegates—that is to say, one member for every 10,000 of population; and 16 Senators—that is to say, one Senator for every 30,000 of population; this without decreasing the representation of any county. Believing as we do in representation according to population, we adopt as our own the carefully prepared bill of the Just Representation League of Maryland, which is based upon this principle and which provides not only for an increase of the representation of Baltimore city, but also for all parts of Maryland which are underrepresented.

We advocate a just, impartial and unprejudiced supervision and control on public service corporations and public utilities generally in this State.

We ask all honest men to aid us in chosing a General Assembly which shall repeal the iniquitous "Wilson" law and once more assure to every constitutional voter the right to have his ballot cast according to his conscience and counted as cast.

We believe in a just and fair primary election law.

We favor a progressive, practical and enlightened policy of good roads construction by the State.

We demand the strict and impartial enforcement of the corrupt practices act.

We favor a revaluation and reassessment of property in order to equalize the burdens of taxation.

We favor State care of the indigent insane and feeble-minded.

We favor the ratification by the Legislature of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States authorizing Congress to levy a tax on incomes.

We heartily indorse the passage of a pure food and drug bill by the next General Assembly which shall conform to the phraseology and intent of the national pure food and drug act of June 30, 1906.

We deplore the recurring agitation of the suffrage question as detrimental to the State's highest interests and as a detraction to the commercial, industrial and agricultural development of the State, and express our confident belief that the people of the state, wearied of this agitation, will repudiate it forever at the approaching election.

Garrett County Road Construction.

About one hundred and twenty five laborers are engaged on the work of road building in Garrett county under the contract awarded to Mr. J. E. Francis, of Punxatawney, Penn., and satisfactory progress is being made. Mr. J. M. Tucker is chairman of the State Roads Commission, W. W. Crosby, Chief Engineer. The Division Inspector is Mr. C. A. Tenny, Mr. R. C. Price, of Baltimore being inspector on the work.

On inclement days but little progress is made, but when the conditions are fine, the new road fairly grows. It runs from Sandy Flat along the Hoop-pole road towards Oakland, and this will reach completion before bad weather sets in, if nothing prevents.

After the earth excavation is made to shape it up and thus reach its true cross section and grade, begins the laying of five inches of broken sand stone. This sand stone is thoroughly rolled, and then on top of that is placed three inches of lime stone, which is also well rolled, and on top of that layer, is placed half an inch of lime stone screenings.

The watering carts follow this application, the steam roller coming along immediately after the application of the water.

Every attention is paid to detail and Contractor Francis is determined that Garrett county shall have, in the way of road building, work equal to the best New Jersey county roads. It was in New Jersey and Pennsylvania that Mr. Franics had large experience in work of this character. H.

INTER-STATE GOOD ROADS CONFERENCE

To Be Held at Mt. Lake Park August 27th-30th.

The proposed Good Roads meeting at Mountain Lake Park to be held conjointly by the good roads advocates of Maryland and West Virginia promises to be more of a success than anticipated. Much interest in the meeting is apparent and indications point to the presence of many prominent men of both states. For the occasion a program has been arranged which covers the four days' meeting of the advocates of improved roads, which is presented below:

Friday, August 27th, 8:00 p. m.—Inter-State Good Roads banquet, to be held at the Mountain Lake Hotel. Tickets will be $1.00. All applicants for tickets should send their names with the money to Dr. W. W. Davis, Mountain Lake Park, Md., by Wednesday, Aug. 25th.

Saturday, August 28th, 9:00 to 9:30 a. m.—"The Road Laws of West Virginia and Their Application," by Mr. C. P. Light, commissioner of highways of West Virginia.

9:30-10:00 a. m.—Open conference.

10:00-10:30 a. m.—"Building Good Roads in Maryland," by a representative of the Maryland Highways Commission.

10:30-11:00 a. m.—Open conference.

11:00 a. m.—Address by Mr. Archer B. Hulbert, Marietta, Ohio, representative of the Agricultural Department, on "Road Economics."

3:00 p. m.—General conference on Good Roads, conducted by Hon. W. M. Havs, assistant secretary of the Department of Agriculture.

8:00 p. m.—"The Alpha and Omega of Good Roads," an illustrated lecture by Mr. Charles H. Hoyt, of the Department of Agriculture.

Sunday, August 29th, 10:30 a. m.—Sermon, "Good Roads and the Kingdom." Preacher to be announced later.

Monday, August 30th, 9:00-12:00 a. m.—Addresses by a number of prominent speakers.

Monday Afternoon—A series of addresses, in which the county commissioners of Maryland and the members of the county courts of West Virginia will take part. Monday afternoon's meeting will deal almost exclusively with the county commissioners' problems.

Monday Evening—Popular platform meeting, speakers to be announced later.

The Governors of Maryland and West Virginia have both promised to be present and will deliver addresses.

Premium For Pennies With Designer's Name.

Premiums are already being offered for the "Honest Abe" penny. In centres where the new coins have been distributed plentifully, it is said that many of them have been sold at ten cents each, and in other places where they are rare from fifty cents to one dollar has been paid for one.

The mint turned out 27,955,000 before the order to stop was issued. In other words, there is one penny for every third person in the United States at the present time. About 14,000,000 of the cents have been distributed, and the remainder will be shipped out as soon as orders are received. The next 'edition' of the Lincoln penny will be the same as the first with the important exception that the letters "V. D. B." will be eliminated, and a single letter of the designer's name will appear on an obscure part of the coin.

The slot machines are said to be complaining of the new coin. It is the same in size and weight as the old, but it will "work" the delicately adjusted penny-in-the-slot contrivance. This is due to the fact that the rim of the new penny is higher than the rim of the old, making it thicker in relation to the slot.

PECULIAR ACCIDENT.

Fell Out of a Window Onto Car Track.

There was a peculiar accident at Wallman Station, on Western Maryland railroad, yesterday morning, but owing to the fact that there is no telegraphic communication with Wallman station, the real particulars could not be learned. It would seem, however, that a laborer by the name of Jacob Godfrey, lived in a house along the track and went to sleep while leaning out a window and fell onto the railroad track just as a train was passing, the latter running over Godfrey, cutting off both the latter's legs.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MR. ELLITHORP

Drouth Which Prevailed There Has Been Broken.

To the Editor of the Republican:

The prolonged drouth has been broken at last by heavy rains and fierce electrical storms and notwithstanding the heavy rains it still continues very warm.

Barley is about all stacked. Most all of the oats is in shock and the rain has thoroughly soaked the shocks and the continuad warm weather is causing it to heat and it is sprouting considerable. The heavy rains have redeemed the corn which is earing with favorable weather for some time will make an excellent crop. Ere long the hum of the threshing machine will be heard in all directions.

A man from here was visiting a friend in Idaho who said he had to haul water seven miles. "Why don't you have a well drilled?" he was asked, to which he replied, "It is all the same distance; the only difference is one is practically level and the other would be straight up."

I see there has been another political kick in Garrett county, as usual. It surprises me that some people wouldn't get tired of kicking some time, but it is as an old friend said to me, "some men are born kicking and go through the world kicking and will die kicking, and you know the rest." It would take an able bodied mule to hold his end up with some men when it comes to kicking. C. E. E.

The Personnel of The Republican Ticket.

To the Editor of The Republican:

The noise and turmoil of the convention have passed away; the political horizon is no longer leaden with the smoke of battle; the sun of party success is shining bright and warm upon the scene of action and in its light men are viewing, with varied frankness, the personnel of the Republican ticket placed before the people by the County Convention on Wednesday, August the 18th.

Basing our criticism on facts, rather than fancy, we see in the person of the nominee for State Senator a gentleman of strong and firm personal character; a man of unflaging energy, zealous and whole-souled devotion to any cause in which he is interested; a man embodying all the ability and requisites that go to make a successful representative of the people. His success in private and business life commend him as a man of marked qualifications and his known devotion to the principles of the Republican party demand for him the support of every Republican.

The gentlemen nominated for the State Legislature stand before the people backed by wholesome records of usefulness and success. As men faithful in the discharge of their duties, fair in their dealings with their fellow men and conscientious in their position in public life, they are strong and deserving claimants to the suffrage of the people.

The nominees for Sheriff, for Commissioners, for Clerk and for Surveyor are gentlemen of wholesome character and possess a high sense of honor as well as ability to discharge satisfactorily and well the duties of the offices which they seek. These gentlemen are respected and esteemed by those who know them and each in his respective place is an important factor in the integral strength of the ticket and the confidence manifested by the convention in placing them on the ticket, should be repeated by the people, in their subsequent election.

Let every Republican rally to the support of this ticket and stand shoulder to shoulder dauntlessly facing the hot fire of the campaign and thus fearlessly carrying the banner of prosperity and success over the heads of these gentlemen, and there will roll up at the fall election a majority so large that it will live long in the history of Garrett county politics.

Train No. 3 Wrecked.

Train No. 3 from the east was quite badly wrecked by being side-wiped by a freight train at a point about five miles east of Cumberland Monday morning. No. 3's engine was almost demolished, the steps torn from one side of the passenger coaches and the passengers all badly shaken up, but none injured. The fireman on No. 3 was slightly injured. A relief train was sent to the scene from Cumberland, the passengers were transferred and taken on to their destination, the train arriving here two hours late.

THE REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION YESTERDAY

Mr. Frank E. Williams, of Cecil County, For Comptroller.

BALTIMORE, MD., Aug. 25.—Unanimity of purpose and harmony reigned at today's Republican State Convention, held in the Maryland Theatre, so that the making of the platform and the selection of a candidate for State Comptroller was consummated with the least possible confusion. Frank E. Williams, of Cecil, was named as the party candidate to oppose Dr. Joshua W. Hering, of Carroll, the nominee of the Democratic party. Congressman Sydney E. Mudd was absent, being sick in a hospital, while ex-Congressman Wm. H. Jackson is laid up at his home. Congressman George A. Pearre, who was regarded as a possible insurgent, was present, but with no fire of battle in his eye. He was docile and complacent and had evidently come to the convention prepared to accept at the hands of those in control, whatever was handed out to him. Any ideas he may have had as to opposing that part of the platform relative to increased representation for Baltimore, did not find expression, the congressman from the Sixth being silent on the subject.

The theatre was crowded with delegates from Baltimore city and the counties, in addition to hundreds of other interested parties, when chairman John B. Mr. Hanna said that the Republicans hoped to work for a just representation for Baltimore city and the counties, and shortly afterwards Thomas Parran was nominated as chairman by Congressman Pearre.

Mr. Parran was elected chairman unanimously and amid great enthusiasm.

In his speech Col. Pearre denounced the Democratic party and scathingly arraigned its leaders. He attacked the suffrage amendment and predicted its defeat.

Pearre, in closing his speech, declared that the plan for representation for Baltimore City according to population would be accepted very gracefully by the Allegany delegation, although this assertion was in no wise in accord with its original opinion.

Congressman Pearre, John P. Hill, of Baltimore, and E. M. Allen, of Harford county, escorted Mr. Parran to the chair. Mr. Parran made a characteristic speech in which he ridiculed the Democratic plank and the suffrage amendment.

The making of a platform proved an easy task. It is along the line of the platform adoped by the Republicans of Baltimore city when they held their Legislative conventions a few days ago. Nothing seems to be lacking however, in the pledge it makes for greater Legislative representation for Baltimore city.

The paramount issue is made the disfranchisement amendment. It contains the Just Representation League bill for city representation and an income tax plank; a public utilities plank and a denunciation of the Democratic State and city administrations, as well as of the good roads commission. A reassessment plank is incorporaned and the entire platform was adopted without a dissenting voice.

The nomination of the candidate for State comptrolier followed. Ex-State Senator H. M. McCullough nominated Frank E. Williams, of Cecil county and he was unanimously chosen as the candidate.

The platform adopted by the convention was as follows:

We the representatives of the Republicans of Maryland, in Convention assembled, realized that no national issues are involved in the present campaign in this State, except in so far as the attempt to adopt an un-American suffrage system in one State of the Union may effect the common sisterhood of the States of the Union.

Republicans in Maryland claim help from all good citizens, whatever their politics or party, from all sincere friends of honest government and pure politics, in defeating the proposed amendment to our State Constitution, which we accept as the paramount issue in this campaign. Like the amendment rejected by the people four years ago, this measure would make of Maryland a one-party State, subject, with no hope of rescue, to the misrule of those selfish and unscrupulous men, long supreme in the Democratic party organization, against whose methods and aims thousands of Democrats have again and again protested at the polls.

We charge the present Democratic State administration with gross inefficiency and mismanagement. We point to the last session of its Legislature which has been marked by unprecedented extravagance, by the most shameless multiplication of useless State employees at the public expense, by a brazen refusal to even respectfully consider the recommendations of economical procedure, offered by Governor Warfield in his retiring message.

We point to the record of the Democratic city administration in Baltimore, where exposures of lax business methods and notorious scandals have followed in rapid and startling succession; notably the defalcation in the City Register's office, resulting in the loss of nearly $70,000 of the people's money.

We solemnly declare that we will do all in our power to have passed by the next Legislature, and thereafter adopted by the people of the State, a constitutional amendment whereby Baltimore city shall have 52 members of the House of Delegates—that is to say, one member for every 10,000 of population; and 16 Senators—that is to say, one Senator for every 30,000 of population; this without decreasing the representation o any county. Believing as we do in representation according to population, we adopt as our own the carefully prepared bill of the Just Representation League of Maryland, which is based upon this principle and which provides not only for an increase of the representation of Baltimore city, but also for all parts of Maryland which are underrepresented.

We advocate a just, impartial and unprejudiced supervision and control on public service corporations and public utilities generally in this State.

We ask all honest men to aid us in chosing a General Assembly which shall repeal the iniquitous "Wilson" law and once more assure to every constitutional voter the right to have his ballot cast according to his conscience and counted as cast.

We believe in a just and fair primary election law.

We favor a progressive, practical and enlightened policy of good roads construction by the State.

We demand the strict and impartial enforcement of the corrupt practices act.

We favor a revaluation and reassessment of property in order to equalize the burdens of taxation.

We favor State care of the indigent insane and feeble-minded.

We favor the ratification by the Legislature of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States authorizing Congress to levy a tax on incomes.

We heartily indorse the passage of a pure food and drug bill by the next General Assembly which shall conform to the phraseology and intent of the national pure food and drug act of June 30, 1906.

We deplore the recurring agitation of the suffrage question as detrimental to the State's highest interests and as a detraction to the commercial, industrial and agricultural development of the State, and express our confident belief that the people of the state, wearied of this agitation, will repudiate it forever at the approaching election.

Garrett County Road Construction.

About one hundred and twenty five laborers are engaged on the work of road building in Garrett county under the contract awarded to Mr. J. E. Francis, of Punxatawney, Penn., and satisfactory progress is being made. Mr. J. M. Tucker is chairman of the State Roads Commission, W. W. Crosby, Chief Engineer. The Division Inspector is Mr. C. A. Tenny, Mr. R. C. Price, of Baltimore being inspector on the work.

On inclement days but little progress is made, but when the conditions are fine, the new road fairly grows. It runs from Sandy Flat along the Hoop-pole road towards Oakland, and this will reach completion before bad weather sets in, if nothing prevents.

After the earth excavation is made to shape it up and thus reach its true cross section and grade, begins the laying of five inches of broken sand stone. This sand stone is thoroughly rolled, and then on top of that is placed three inches of lime stone, which is also well rolled, and on top of that layer, is placed half an inch of lime stone screenings.

The watering carts follow this application, the steam roller coming along immediately after the application of the water.

Every attention is paid to detail and Contractor Francis is determined that Garrett county shall have, in the way of road building, work equal to the best New Jersey county roads. It was in New Jersey and Pennsylvania that Mr. Franics had large experience in work of this character. H.

INTER-STATE GOOD ROADS CONFERENCE

To Be Held at Mt. Lake Park August 27th-30th.

The proposed Good Roads meeting at Mountain Lake Park to be held conjointly by the good roads advocates of Maryland and West Virginia promises to be more of a success than anticipated. Much interest in the meeting is apparent and indications point to the presence of many prominent men of both states. For the occasion a program has been arranged which covers the four days' meeting of the advocates of improved roads, which is presented below:

Friday, August 27th, 8:00 p. m.—Inter-State Good Roads banquet, to be held at the Mountain Lake Hotel. Tickets will be $1.00. All applicants for tickets should send their names with the money to Dr. W. W. Davis, Mountain Lake Park, Md., by Wednesday, Aug. 25th.

Saturday, August 28th, 9:00 to 9:30 a. m.—"The Road Laws of West Virginia and Their Application," by Mr. C. P. Light, commissioner of highways of West Virginia.

9:30-10:00 a. m.—Open conference.

10:00-10:30 a. m.—"Building Good Roads in Maryland," by a representative of the Maryland Highways Commission.

10:30-11:00 a. m.—Open conference.

11:00 a. m.—Address by Mr. Archer B. Hulbert, Marietta, Ohio, representative of the Agricultural Department, on "Road Economics."

3:00 p. m.—General conference on Good Roads, conducted by Hon. W. M. Hays, assistant secretary of the Department of Agriculture.

8:00 p. m.—"The Alpha and Omega of Good Roads," an illustrated lecture by Mr. Charles H. Hoyt, of the Department of Agriculture.

Sunday, August 29th, 10:30 a. m.—Sermon, "Good Roads and the Kingdom." Preacher to be announced later.

Monday, August 30th, 9:00-12:00 a. m.—Addresses by a number of prominent speakers.

Monday Afternoon—A series of addresses, in which the county commissioners of Maryland and the members of the county courts of West Virginia will take part. Monday afternoon's meeting will deal almost exclusively with the county commissioners' problems.

Monday Evening—Popular platform meeting, speakers to be announced later.

The Governors of Maryland and West Virginia have both promised to be present and will deliver addresses.

Premium For Pennies With Designer's Name.

Premiums are already being offered for the "Honest Abe" penny. In centres where the new coins have been distributed plentifully, it is said that many of them have been sold at ten cents each, and in other places where they are rare from fifty cents to one dollar has been paid for one.

The mint turned out 27,955,000 before the order to stop was issued. In other words, there is one penny for every third person in the United States at the present time. About 14,000,000 of the cents have been distributed, and the remainder will be shipped out as soon as orders are received. The next 'edition' of the Lincoln penny will be the same as the first with the important exception that the letters "V. D. B." will be eliminated, and a single letter of the designer's name will appear on an obscure part of the coin.

The slot machines are said to be complaining of the new coin. It is the same in size and weight as the old, but it will "work" the delicately adjusted penny-in-the-slot contrivance. This is due to the fact that the rim of the new penny is higher than the rim of the old, making it thicker in relation to the slot.

PECULIAR ACCIDENT.

Fell Out of a Window Onto Car Track.

There was a peculiar accident at Wallman Station, on Western Maryland railroad, yesterday morning, but owing to the fact that there is no telegraphic communication with Wallman station, the real particulars could not be learned. It would seem, however, that a laborer by the name of Jacob Godfrey, lived in a house along the track and went to sleep while leaning out a window and fell onto the railroad track just as a train was passing, the latter running over Godfrey, cutting off both the latter's legs.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MR. ELLITHORP

Drouth Which Prevailed There Has Been Broken.

To the Editor of the Republican:

The prolonged drouth has been broken at last by heavy rains and fierce electrical storms and notwithstanding the heavy rains it still continues very warm.

Barley is about all stacked. Most all of the oats is in shock and the rain has thoroughly soaked the shocks and the continuad warm weather is causing it to heat and it is sprouting considerable. The heavy rains have redeemed the corn which is earing with favorable weather for some time will make an excellent crop. Ere long the hum of the threshing machine will be heard in all directions.

A man from here was visiting a friend in Idaho who said he had to haul water seven miles. "Why don't you have a well drilled?" he was asked, to which he replied, "It is all the same distance; the only difference is one is practically level and the other would be straight up."

I see there has been another political kick in Garrett county, as usual. It surprises me that some people wouldn't get tired of kicking some time, but it is as an old friend said to me, "some men are born kicking and go through the world kicking and will die kicking, and you know the rest." It would take an able bodied mule to hold his end up with some men when it comes to kicking. C. E. E.

The Personnel of The Republican Ticket.

To the Editor of The Republican:

The noise and turmoil of the convention have passed away; the political horizon is no longer leaden with the smoke of battle; the sun of party success is shining bright and warm upon the scene of action and in its light men are viewing, with varied frankness, the personnel of the Republican ticket placed before the people by the County Convention on Wednesday, August the 18th.

Basing our criticism on facts, rather than fancy, we see in the person of the nominee for State Senator a gentleman of strong and firm personal character; a man of unflaging energy, zealous and whole-souled devotion to any cause in which he is interested; a man embodying all the ability and requisites that go to make a successful representative of the people. His success in private and business life commend him as a man of marked qualifications and his known devotion to the principles of the Republican party demand for him the support of every Republican.

The gentlemen nominated for the State Legislature stand before the people backed by wholesome records of usefulness and success. As men faithful in the discharge of their duties, fair in their dealings with their fellow men and conscientious in their position in public life, they are strong and deserving claimants to the suffrage of the people.

The nominees for Sheriff, for Commissioners, for Clerk and for Surveyor are gentlemen of wholesome character and possess a high sense of honor as well as ability to discharge satisfactorily and well the duties of the offices which they seek. These gentlemen are respected and esteemed by those who know them and each in his respective place is an important factor in the integral strength of the ticket and the confidence manifested by the convention in placing them on the ticket, should be repeated by the people, in their subsequent election.

Let every Republican rally to the support of this ticket and stand shoulder to shoulder dauntlessly facing the hot fire of the campaign and thus fearlessly carrying the banner of prosperity and success over the heads of these gentlemen, and there will roll up at the fall election a majority so large that it will live long in the history of Garrett county politics.

Train No. 3 Wrecked.

Train No. 3 from the east was quite badly wrecked by being side-wiped by a freight train at a point about five miles east of Cumberland Monday morning. No. 3's engine was almost demolished, the steps torn from one side of the passenger coaches and the passengers all badly shaken up, but none injured. The fireman on No. 3 was slightly injured. A relief train was sent to the scene from Cumberland, the passengers were transferred and taken on to their destination, the train arriving here two hours late.

WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnificent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience; America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,-000.00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and believe that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator is still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

DISH-WASHING EASY

THREE-TIMES-A-DAY LABOR IS UNNECESSARY.

Writer in The Housekeeper Shows How Work May Be Done with Comparative Comfort—Use Handy Drainer.

One of the unnecessary things in housekeeping is the continuous washing and wiping of dishes. Methinks I hear a cry of horror from a horde of housekeepers, but many of them have, nevertheless, at one time or another, rebelled against the stack of dishes which looms up, like the schoolboy's hash, "three times a day." It is queer how some women will wear themselves out rather than step aside from the beaten path. They have yet to learn the joy that comes from taking an independent tack and making the work subservient to the worker; from being the master instead of the slave. To many women, the bugbear of housework is dishwashing. Why wash dishes three times a day? Do it in the morning, when fresh; scrape the dinner dishes, stack in a large pan filled with cold water, and cover. Treat the supper dishes the same way, and do not allow your conscience to keep you awake one single hour. It will not make the task too heavy the next morning, if you try my way. After washing each piece in hot suds and rinsing in hot (not warm), water, put them, piece by piece, in the wire drainer (price ten cents), as nearly on edge or aslant, as possible, and let stand until dry. Glasses, of course, and silver, must be wiped; but the former can be left filled, after using, and the latter put into a pitcher or deep jug until some odd minute when one is not so weary with well-doing that another turn of the screw seems next to impossible.—The Housekeeper.

A Seasonable Appetizer.

Wash four large, firm ripe tomatoes. Cut across horizontally and scoop out contents, carefully preserving shape of cups. Put cups on ice, also the pieces scooped out, cut very small, till near serving time. Put through the chopper two crisp green peppers of good size, minus stems and seeds, also half a medium-sized onion. Just before serving mix with the cut tomatoes, adding salt to taste, a very little vinegar and one-fourth teaspoonful of sugar. Serve in the tomato cups with garnish of parsley or nasturtium leaves or curled mustard. Sometimes I cut the whole tomato in small pieces and serve in small glass dishes. If I have not enough tomatoes, a small cucumber crisped in ice water and cut in little bits is an addition and to some palates an improvement.—San Francisco Call.

Dried Pumpkin for Pies.

Take a thin paring from the pumpkin, scrape out the seeds, and cut into slices an inch thick. Cut these crosswise in thin slices, spread on plates, and dry in a moderate oven, in the warming closet of the range, or in a small fruit drier. Store in paper bags, tin boxes such as often accumulate around the house, or in fruit jars. The main thing is to put it beyond the reach of insects or dampness.

To use dried pumpkin soak it over night in more than twice as much water as is needed to cover. Cook in the same water until tender and the water is almost entirely evaporated, then use according to recipe, for stewed fresh pumpkin.

Luncheon Dish.

Boil a good-sized chicken until done. Separate from bones and cut up as if for a salad. To this put a coffee cup of bread or cracker crumbs, a coffee cup of milk, a heaping tablespoonful of butter, salt and pepper to taste. Mix and put in a bowl or pan and steam till hot through. As it is served cover with cream sauce and mushrooms. To make sauce, take one pint of sweet milk. Let it come to a boil and then stir in two teaspoonfuls of flour previously mixed with cold milk, a spoonful of butter, and can of mushrooms.

Supreme of Chicken.

Chop the choicest parts of a raw chicken very fine, having about two cups; add four well beaten eggs, one at a time, until the mixture is smooth; add one and one-half cups of thick cream, half a teaspoonful of salt, and a quarter saltspoonful of pepper. Decorate molds with truffles, fill with the mixture, cover with buttered papers, set in a pan of hot water, and bake 20 minutes; serve with a sauce made of one cup each of white stock and milk and the yolks of three eggs.

Marshmallow Fudge.

Two and one-half cups brown sugar, one-half cup white sugar, one-half cup cream, pinch cream of tartar. Boil ten minutes, then add one-quarter pound marshmallows, and boil two minutes longer. Add one cup slightly salted, broken walnuts, after removing from fire, and beat on the back of range. (By so doing the candy does not cool so quickly, and you can beat it longer, thereby improving it.) Pour in buttered tin to cool.

Batter Pudding.

One quart milk, four eggs, half teaspoon salt, eight tablespoons sifted flour. Beat with mixing spoon until thoroughly blended and bake in buttered dish in hot oven about 20 minutes. Sauce is creamed butter and sugar flavored with lemon juice.

Buttermilk Pie.

One cup buttermilk, one cup sugar, one egg, one teaspoon flour, two teaspoons melted butter, two teaspoons extract of lemon. Bake in two crusts.

THE ELECTRICAL WORLD

QUEER TELEGRAPH POLES.

Mud the Only Material Out of Which to Build Them in Bolivia.

What the writer calls "the most original telegraph line in the world" once extended between the city of La Paz, the capital of Bolivia, and the town of Oruro, the terminus of the railway connecting it with the seaport of Antofagasta, where the remains of the line may still be seen. Says a writer in the Electrical Review:

"In this part of Bolivia there are no growing trees, and wood is so difficult to procure that even the ordinary household furniture of the natives is invariably made, not of wood, but of dried mud, or adobe, as it is called. It is, therefore, not surprizing that when the war broke out in 1880 between Chile and Bolivia, and the need for a telegraph line between the two places mentioned became urgent, that, as all communication with any seaport was cut off, this material was used to construct pillars to take the place of ordinary posts for supporting the wire, with the addition of old bottles as insulators. These pillars were substantially built on stone foundations, and measured about five feet square at the base, with a height of about 15 feet. They were placed at intervals of about 110 meters (361 feet), and thus held the wire at a height sufficient to clear the only animals of the country, the llama and donkey. The total length of the line was 156 miles, and it rendered useful service for some ten years before being replaced by the ordinary wooden telegraph-pole line. A correspondent of ours, who made a journey in the neighborhood recently, sends us a photograph of one of these pillars, showing the remarkable state of preservation after being abandoned for 20 years. Among other curious telegraph lines may be mentioned the growing pole line erected in Uganda by an ingenious English engineer, who, unable to find any dead wood which would withstand the white ants, hit on the idea of transporting growing bark-cloth trees to the side of the roads and using them as poles. This system has, we believe, been in use some ten years with success, and no doubt our readers have noticed photographs of these tree poles which have appeared in magazines. In the Dutch East Indies trees are also made use of for a similar purpose, but here a wire is stretched across the road between trees on either side, and the insulator is suspended in its middle, and the line is thus over the road and clear from vegetation."

AN ELECTRIC FURNACE.

Simple Contrivance in Which Intense Heat Can Be Generated.

Make an ordinary sheet iron basin and line it inside with asbestos mill board. The connections are made through two binding-posts placed in the bottom of the pan and fastened to two small carbons, says Practical Engineer. The bottom of the pan is covered with granulated carbon to a depth of from one to two inches.

Gives an Intense Heat.

When the current is turned on a very intense heat can be raised. Some resistance is necessary and it is best to have a rheostat so as to turn on more current as the heat increases, as, of course, the hotter the carbon gets, the more current it will take.

Electric Machines Affect the Compass.

Very often, after a ship has been unloaded by an electric machine, the compass is found to be pointing incorrectly. It has been suggested by the manager of a well-known fleet that turning a ship around after leaving the docks will probably bring the compass back.

THE TRUANT'S REWARD.

How the Absentminded Professor Chastised His Son.

THE absentminded professor returned home one night to learn that his son had played truant from school, and he was asked by his wife to hunt up the missing youngster and administer a sound thrashing.

"Why, I'll flay him alive!" exclaimed the angry father. "I'll break every bone in his body! Just wait until I get him out in the wood shed!"

He came across his heir playing marbles about a mile from home, but the boy didn't seem to be a bit alarmed by the old man's threats. As they started to return home the absentminded professor stopped to chat with an old acquaintance, and it was fifteen or twenty minutes later when he looked down in wonder at the boy at his side and asked:

"Why, where did you come from, Jack?"

"Don't you remember, father?" smiled the boy. "We are on our way to buy me a box of candy because of my excellent school report."

"Bless me, but so we are!" agreed the absentminded professor as he patted the boy on the back and started for the store.—New York Herald.

"Is it true that you farmers are hostile to balloonists?" ventured the young aeronaut who had descended in the barnyard.

"Why, no, stranger!" laughed the old farmer as he came forward with a pitchfork. "We are always glad to have a balloon land on our place."

"I'm certainly glad to hear it."

"Yes; the last one that landed here came in handy. I used the ropes to tie the steers, packed corn in the basket and cut the gas bag up and made overalls for all the farm hands. Welcome, stranger, welcome!"—Chicago News.

THE LIMEKILN CLUB.

Brother Gardner and His After Business Talk With Members.

POET JONES CALLED DOWN.

Told to Hustle Around For a Job Instead of Trying to Write—Brother Poker Thompson and Brother Jackson's Bad Debts.

[Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.]

When the regular business of the monthly meeting of the Limekiln club had been disposed of Brother Gardner arose and said:

"If Brudder Givadam Jones am in de hall dis evenin' I should like a few words wid him."

Brother Jones was there, and he rose up and folded his arms and faced the music.

"Brudder Jones," continued the president, "I was told de odder day dat you was three months behind on your rent."

"Yes, sah. Times am so hard dat I can't pay my rent and lib too. Been lookin' all ober fur work, but can't find it."

"BRUDDER THOMPSON, YOU OWE DE GROCER AND DE BUTCHER AND YOUR LANDLORD."

"Yes, Brudder Jones, times am hard and work skerce, but jest what have you been doin' fur de last thirty days? Has you been hustlin' fur a job or has you been sittin' in de house most of de time writin' poetry?"

"I—I has written some poetry, sah."

"So I understand. In fact, I's got one of your poems right yere in my hand Does poetry pay house rent, Brudder Jones?"

"N-no, sah."

"Does it buy taters and bacon?"

"No, sah."

"Buy shoes fur de old woman and de chillen?"

"No, sah."

"Den will you kindly tell me what you been foolin' away de last thirty days fur?"

"I reckoned I might sell de poetry sah."

"Oh, I see. You writ, and you reckoned you might sell de follerin' poem De gemlen of de club will listen while I read:

"Oh, de summer days am passin',
And de fall will soon be here,
And de glorious watermillyon
Will no longer bring us cheer.

"De robins dey will leave us soon,
De bluebirds fly to hence,
De roses dey will lose deir bloom,
And de hollyhocks go whence.

"It makes me sad and lonesome
Fur to see de days go 'long,
Oh, would 'twas allus as today
Wid blithe and happy song!

"But summer goes and autumn comes
De frost will bring its pallor,
De trees will lose their vivid green,
De green grass turn to yallen.

"Of human beings some will pass
To heaven from earth so dreary,
And others will remain to live
And spring will find 'em weary.

"Brudder Jones," asked the president when he had finished reading the verses, "am dis de poem dat it took you thirty days to bring fo'th?"

"Yes, sah. It took most of my time."

"Jest sot right dar and run out your tongue and rolled up your eyes and thought and thought?"

"I reckon so."

"You am werry much consarned about de robins and de bluebirds, Brudder Jones."

Silence on Brother Jones' part.

"And you seem to keer a heap mo' about dyin' roses and hollyhocks dan you do about your back rent."

More silence.

Told to Look For Work.

"Brudder Jones, de world has had poetry eber since dar was a man or woman to make mad rhyme wid sad, and it will keep on wantin' it to de end, but it hain't fur you and me to write it. It's fur Rockefeller and Morgan and de rich men dat have de time to set down and work deir brains and sweat deir collars. I don't want to be arbitrary wid you, fur you seem to have de poetic instinct, but I must say dat if you don't hustle around and strike a job and pay up your debts dis Limekiln club will know you no mo'. We may like poetry, but dar's our wives and chillen dey like taters and bacon better. Dig a deep hole in sandy ell and burry your poem in it and tomorrow start out and look fur a job."

Brother Jones coiled in something of a dilapidated condition, and then the president looked around and said:

"I see dat Brudder Poker Thompson am sittin' ober dar behind de stove and rosstin' hisself. Will he please come forward?"

"What has I done?" asked Brother Thompson as he posed himself before the platform.

"Brudder Thompson, you owe de grocer and de butcher and your landlord."

"But how am I gwine to pay in dese hard times?"

"How has you spent your last two weeks?"

"I's been gittin' up a lecture, sah."

"Dat's what I heard. Dat lecture am on religun, I hear."

"Yes, sah. I's gwine around de kentry to let de folks know dat on de 3d of next July de world am comin' to an end and dey must prepare fur it. I reckon to do a heap of good and I a lot of money."

"How do you get your news about de endin' up of de world on dat perticklar day, Brudder Thompson?"

"From de Bible and de signs in de heavens, sah. I's figgered it out twenty different times, and it comes de same ebery time. I was lookin' last night, and I saw mo' dan fifty signs in de heavens."

"Did you see your debts up dar?"

"No, sah."

"See any shoes fur your chillen?"

"De heavens don't gib out no sech signs as shoes."

"Oh, I see! Well, mebbe de heavens showed you a sign of a cull'd man belin' dropped outer de back doah of dis hall into de alley below. Whether dey did or not, you pay 'tention to what I'm sayin'. Drap dat lecture bizness. Any man, white or black, who goes into sich a thing am a fule. Anybody who listens to him am de same thing. You don't know no mo' about de endin' up of de world dan my ole dawg knows about playin' de fiddle, and if you keep on your name will be crossed off our books. Drap nonsense like a hot tater and find a job and git to work. I shall have an eye on you fur de next few weeks."

Jackson's Bad Debts.

Brother Sunnown Jackson was then called upon to come forward, and when he had got in position the president said:

"Brudder Jackson, I's told dat your debts amount to a hundred dollars."

"But it's all owin' to de panic, sah," was the excuse.

"I's heard all about dat panic and don't want to hear any mo'. You hain't lookin' fur work. You don't want to find work. You have been loafin' around fur de last fo' weeks tryin' to figger out a system dat will beat de bank at Monte Carlo. Monte Carlo am a long ways off, while your creditors am right at your doah. Systems don't pay rent nor buy shoes. I know fur a fact dat your chillen am barefut, and if you don't get a hustle on you I shall sartinly figger out some system dat will take you out of dis club wid a pain around your heart. I's gwine to hab my eye on you fur de next two weeks, and if you don't git a hustle on you you'll feel airthquakes shakin' the ground around your cabin. What you want is a system to git out of bed at 6 o'clock in de mawnin' and keep goin' all day, and if system am big 'nuff it might find a way fur you to pay me back de $2 you borrowed of me a year ago. We will now break de meetin' in two and go home." M. QUAD.

In Doubt.

"Is your son-in-law, the duke, a good conversationalist?"

SHIPS AND METEORS.

A Possible Solution of Mysterious Disappearances at Sea.

Scientists abroad are urging captains of the world's merchant marine and sailors in general to make exact observations of every extraordinarily large meteor coming within their range of vision and record what they may observe.

There is no doubt, the men of science point out, that meteors, to a far greater extent than we until now have realized, are responsible for those incomprehensible disappearances of ships in calm weather and smooth sea. We know that meteors are more frequent at certain times of the year than at others. In all probability also certain regions of the oceans are more open to meteors than are other tracts.

Conspicuous among the more recent meetings of meteors and ships is that of the English steamer Cambrian. On the way from London to Boston the ship, in the forty-second degree of north latitude, on the 16th of August last, by a few feet only escaped destruction by a meteor as huge as a four story house, says the Chicago Tribune. The meteor fell into the sea not over eighty feet away, and in spite of its 6,000 tons capacity the ship was lifted many feet in the air by the agitated waters. The terror stricken crew came out of it unharmed, however.

The English sail ship Eclipse was not so lucky about half a year ago. In the Pacific ocean, the vessel steering for the Hawaiian Island, an immense meteor struck and crushed the foremast and the bow part of the ship. The crew entered into a desperate but futile contest with the water streaming into the hold, but had to abandon the ship and take to the boats. After two weeks of terrible suffering they reached one of the Hawaiian Islands, 900 sea miles from the scene of the distster. Several men died of starvation on the water.

A Norwegian newspaper reports an accident which shows that ships on inland lakes are no safer than are ocean travelers.

The steamer was in the middle of Lake Theiemarken and the time about midnight. As the meteor came from behind, the captain and the pilot on the bridge observed nothing before they were enveloped in the most dazzling white light. Almost in the same moment they heard a crash like that of a gigantic explosion. The sound was so loud, piercing and nerve racking that the strongest thunderclap in their recollection was nothing in comparison.

When the dense clouds of steam from the water, made boiling, scattered it was detected that the meteor had struck the smokestack of the ship and cut off two feet of it at the top. The foremast was struck and cut off in the middle. With the same ease the redhot meteor had melted and burned its way through smokestack and mast. —New York World.

HENRY G. DAVIS

The Senator's Royal Blood As Traced by Genealogist.

The Duke of the Abruzzi has a family tree like the spreading chestnut that sheltered the village smithy, but even it is a mere sapling compared to that of ex-Senator Henry Gassaway Davis and Katharine Elkins, according to Mrs. Albert Levin Richardson, who returned yesterday from abroad. To Mrs. Richardson is due the credit of revealing to an interested world the fact that Senator Davis is not only descended from Charlemagne, King of France but from Pepin I, Pepin II, Bernard and other kings of Italy.

Speaking of her investigations, Mrs. Richardson says:

"The record includes not only many of the greatest crowned heads in the history of Italy, but of England and France also, and dukes, earls, counts and knights, crusaders whose names and deeds illumine the annals of the race, and the pedigree is a marvel of historic interest."

The lineage is so ancient and royal that Mrs. Richardson thought best to have the result of her investigation approved by the registrar of the Herald's College, England. Mrs. Richardson said she never doubted that her discovery was true, but this official seal leaves no room for doubt.

The relationship to Charlemagne Mrs. Richardson states, belongs to Miss Elkins on her mother's side. Mrs. Elkins is the daughter of ex-Senator Davis, who is directly descenced—only 40 generations removed—from Charlmagne. Miss Elkins is 42 generations away, but Charlemagne is still there.

It may be mentioned incidentally thae the Democrats neverknew Senator Davis was related to royalty.

It is suggested that the fact may have been concealed because it was thought by the party managers it would hurt his chances. None of the Senator's friends remembers that he ever confided to anyone that Charlemagne was his uncle, 40 times removed.

Charlemagne captured Saxony; Senator Davis carried West Virginia. Each had a strong following and the support of the organization. Thus is the influence of heredity shown.

On another line it is certified by Mrs. Richardson that Senator Elkins' ancestry goes back to Alfred the Great, whose thousandeth anniversary was celebrated in 1901. —Baltimore Sun.

RICHES HIDDENBY WALLS

MediaevalMethods of Concealment In Baron Rothschild's House.

Thanks to the courtesy of Baron Edouard de Rothschild, I recently assisted at a trial of the most extraordinary system of protecting treasures that has ever been invented.

On the corner of the Rue Balzac and the Rue Faubourg St Honore stands a gorgeous mansion, one of the most magnificent in Paris, surrounded by beautiful gardens. The mansion may be described as a house within a house. In the inner house Honore de Balzac, the father of realistic romance, killed himself by overwork at the age of fifty-one. Here the world's greatest novelist wrote "La Comedie Humaine," and here he thundered forth to his friends that there were three men only in Paris who knew the language—"Hugo, Gautier and myself."

Around this historic house the Rothschilds have really built another and have, moreover, made gardens such as are seen in no other save Paris. All are surrounded by a very high wall, which completely shuts off the view.

In this house are collected the priceless treasures of the Rothschilds—jewels, plate, art treasures of all kinds. And they are so arranged that by touching a spring they vanish as if by magic.

The rooms are lined with false walls, which rotate on pivots in such a way that they close up and leave no trace whatever of any method of movement. The machinery is very elaborate and is kept constantly in order.

Only twice has Baron Rothschild given an exhibition of the working of these wonderful walls to his astonished guests. All is so arranged that at a given signal the machinery is put in motion, and treasures worth billions are shut up within walls which apparently are an immovable part of the house.

Even more remarkable, the family also can be made to disappear, so that the premises look as though they were absolutely deserted. The idea is that if a revolt broke out, this house would very likely be one of the first to be attacked. At this instant of danger the machine would be sprung, and the rioters should be a considerable time in possession before they could find the treasures, if they found them at all. Meanwhile the authorities would have ample time to arrive. —Paris Letter in New York American.

THE GOVERNMENT IN THE WILLOW BUSINESS

Free Distribution of Best Varieties Made from Nurseries Located Near Washington.

The government is right in the midst of the harvest of a most unique crop at its experimental farm near Arlington, just across the Potomac from Washington, where a corps of laborers in charge of trained foresters are preparing for the annual free distribution of 100,000 basket willow cuttings.

Uncle Sam is encouraging the growing of high-grade willow rods in this country, and in the five years since the establishment of the holts at Arlington approximately a half million select cuttings have been distributed among farmers, with directions for planting and preparing for market.

Particular attention is given to selecting the varieties and strains best suited to the soil where the plantings will be made.

Willow craft is an industry which is constantly growing in importance in this country, yet the culture of basket willow in the United States made very little progress until five or six years ago.

Even now, practically all of the best grades of basket willow are imported from Europe, chiefly from France. Experiments have shown that the best grades of willow can be grown in this country at a good profit.

This year's harvest began early in March. Four approved varieties are being sent out, and only the best and most thrifty rods are selected for distribution. Cuttings for experiments, planting and information on management of the willow holts are furnished those who make the request of the forester at Washington.

The government recognizes the importance of good cuttings, a point more commonly overlooked than the matter of cultivation. Only the best and most thrifty rods are selected for each season's distribution.

The forest service is receiving a constantly increasing number of requests for basket willow cuttings. These requests come from farmers all over the country, many of them coming through members of congress.

RELIANCE ON THE ENGINEER.

To the Vigilance of the Man at the Trottle Is the Dependence for Safety in Travel.

Yet there are two real elements of danger in our high speed, says Scribner's. They are inevitable, and the only thing to do is to reduce them as far as it is possible to do so. One is the increase of traffic, freight and passenger, by which the chances of disaster are increased. A fifty dollar freight derailment may at any time, by throwing debris upon the passenger track, wreck a train carrying 500 passengers; and on a four-track line the chance that this will happen is greater than on a double track line. On a single-track line this danger is almost entirely absent. Our fastest trains, however, do not run on single-track lines, and no one has suggested that single-track lines be built exclusively for such trains.

On the New York division of the Pennsylvania between Jersey City and Philadelphia—a typical high-speed line—freight trains are now decidedly more numerous and are longer and heavier than they were ten years ago, and the danger of a passenger wreck is an appreciable percentage greater. The danger is a small one, relatively, but still it is a danger. If a passenger making this journey notices the click of the wheels of the long freight trains as he meets or passes them, he will find that he is thus meeting or passing a train 10 to 20 minutes out of the two hours occupied in making the journey. Five years ago the number of meets probably was not much over one-half as great. The other trunk lines would show similar changes in the volume of traffic.

The other inevitable danger is that due to mistake of judgment on the part of expert enginemen. (The danger chargeable to negligent or incompetent locomotive runners is another question.) One may listen by the hour to the enthusiast who advocates automatic appliances for stopping trains, and detecting floods and broken rails, and for doing other wonderful things by electricity or something else, and may admit most of his claims; one may also give all reasonable weight to the talk about the value of a second or third man as a monitor in the locomotive cab; but he will still find that in actual travel, in myriads of situations, the only dependence of the fast train passenger for safety must be on the vigilance and good judgment of the engineman.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY'S OPPORTUNITY.

The Republican Convention tomorrow has an unusual opportunity to put before the people of the State the issues with which the next campaign should deal. The opposition has left the opening by insisting once more that "negro domination" is the leading question before the people of Maryland in spite of the fact that with the important reforms—the reforms about which the public is really concerned—the elimination of the negro vote has absolutely nothing to do. So little connected is the question of negro disfranchisement with the building of good roads honestly and cheaply, with the proper control and regulation of public service corporations, with the care of the insane with the passage of an up-to-date pure-food law, with fair representation of Baltimore in the legislature, with the repeal of the trick ballot laws, with the ratification of the income tax that the statement in the Democratic platform that the "paramount issue" is disfranchisement of the negro is recognized by every thinking man as a bald misstatement of fact.

The occasion for bringing the issue to the front once more can be nothing other than a desire to give the political leaders in the dominant party a grip upon the State that cannot be broken. It is all well enough to say that the white men of Maryland will not be dominated by a set of grasping politicians. But good government is not an easy thing to get. White men with power in their hands to enforce good government have gone along without it for many years. The more difficult conditions make it to turn politicians out of jobs the more difficult it has been found to get good government. This is not an indictment of the white race. It is the statement of a truism founded in experience.

What "imperative necessity" for taking the vote away from the negro exist? How will the Democratic party be in better position to enact the laws which the people of Maryland have been demanding when the negro is disfranchised than it has been in the last ten years? Its majority in the Legislature has been overwhelming. Will the party do better if it has a unanimous vote in that body than in does when it has three-fourths? It doesn't need more votes in either House or Senate to enact the laws which the State and the city need. By what process of reasoning are sensible men to be made to believe that a party which has had absolute power to make what laws it saw fit and which has refused again and again to enact much-needed reforms will proceed to be good if it is given a little more power?

The Republican party has nothing to fear from the negro issue. The voters of Maryland are not ready to put their necks in a noose. Let the party address itself frankly and boldly to the real issues of the campaign and appeal to the intelligence of the voters to say whether they want to take up businesslike program of reform and carry it forward in a businesslike way or whether they prefer to fight over once more the dead issue of the black man's right of suffrage.—Tuesday's Baltimore News.

PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION.

The discussion going on in various states as to the advisability of Public Utilities Commissions is bringing out expression of views, in many instances at least, of broad and most encouraging significance. Per example the following interview in the Baltimore Sun of the 20th instant:

"No," said President Oscar G. Murray, of the Baltimore and Ohio, "the company is not opposed to the creation in Maryland of a Public Utilities Commission. On the contrary favors such, provided its make-up is with an adequate appreciation of the importance of the matters upon which it would pass."

The assumption had been that upon general principles the railroad was to be classed with the opponents of the proposed measure and Mr. Murray's unhesitating declaration placing him among the advocates of it came as something of a surprise. However, as characteristic of him, his position was made so clear as to leave no room for a misapprehension.

"The interests at stake are too big, involve too deeply the material welfare of communities to constitute the Commission on a 'political basis,'" he said. "Indeed, politics as generally understood, should no more enter into the composition and conduct of the Commission than is permitted in business affairs of large moment. Railroads of late years have been divorced from politics with the decree made more complete than some people appear to realize. It has been demonstrated so good a thing that the companies take most kindly to direct relationship with the public itself and this is what they want in the make-up of a Utilities Commission; representative men who, standing as such in the community, are intellectually capable of making fair decisions on questions coming up between corporations and the public.

"To attract and secure men of this character," continued Mr. Murray, "the compensation must be adequate. Public spirit is an admirable quality but it is not always accompanied by the where-with-all to allow it full play. Good men command good pay and this should be remembered in the provisions for a Commission. Am quite sure," said Mr. Murray in conclusion, "that under the conditions outlined all questions would be thoroughly ventilated so as to assure an equitable conclusion."

BLOOD ON THE MOON.

The open letter of Representative Charles N. Fowler, of the Fifth New Jersey district to Speaker Joseph G. Cannon, has arrived, but Mr. Fowler has not. His five-column attack upon the sage of Danville overshoots the mark because it is too sweeping in its abuse and too prolific of fighting talk. All that Mr. Cannon need do is to retort in the words of the colored lady: "All I say you is, and all you say I is, I say you is, and mo' besides." The speaker is 73 years of age, is serving his eighteenth term in the lower house of congress and is no man's fool. Yet Mr. Fowler sizes him up as possessing qualities and doing things as follows:

Brutal despotism, conspiracy, contemptible trickery, disgraceful hybrid, duplicity, dishonorable and disreputable, disgusting favorism, ignorance, inordinate conceit, malace, miserably contemptible false pretenses, prejudice, putrid preference, political cowardice, perfidy, rotten record, treachery, traitorous treachery, vengeful malice.

If that is all there is the matter with Speaker Cannon he must be a pretty good sort of a man. For a gentleman with a grievance, Mr. Fowler has his temper under remarkable control. Many another, smarting under the rod that chasteneth, would have become abusive. It is a great pity indeed that one who is so conservative of utterance and who is so well versed in the use of politic language should have been deprived of the opportunity of reforming our currency system.

FOR A SIMPLIFIED CALENDER.

When Julius Caesar meddled with the calendar in true imperial fashion he produced "The Year of Confusion," which was 46 B. C. In that year were fifteen months, or 445 days. A great many dates got lost which has never since been found. And the trouble came about—necessitating the Gregorian revision of the calendar sixteen centuries later—through flirting with the new moon as with an auspicious influence according to a popular superstition.

The Julian occasion was by no means the last upon which moonshine and the calendar have collided. Another headon meeting is now suggested by a San Francisco calculator, and while the moonshine in this case is figurative the proposition looks to an ample and material confusion of days. The idea is to have thirteen months of twenty-eight days each, with an "Anno Day" annexed to each December and a "Mid-anno Day" in the exact middle of every leap year.

The originator of this idea makes seventeen points for his calendar, including the fact that it causes every week, month and year to begin on Sunday and end on Saturday. Astronomical periods can be figured and dates set ahead. Existing anniversaries can be readjusted by mutual agreements. But if we do not hurry up and set the new calendar going with 1911 there will be no other good chance till 1922.

Hating to pose among the reactionaries, to refer the new-calendar idea to a joint commission of simplified spellers and set-the-clock-aheaders, with instructions to report not later than the silly season of 1923.—New York World.

THE CENSUS.

In a letter to Secretary Nagle, President Taft gives explicit instructions that census supervisors and enumerators shall keep out of politics during the term of their employment. "I order," writes the President, "that in the preparation of regulations for the taking of the census you and the directors of the census embody a provision therein that any supervisors or enumerator who takes part, other than casting his vote, shall be dismissed from the service."

President Taft's elimination of politics from the census is in keeping with sound public policy. Census supervisors and enumerators ought to be required to give attention exclusively to their duties. The men intrusted with the work of taking the census ought to be thoroughly qualified for the honest and intelligent performance of their duties. The President is doubtless fully informed of the scandalous practices, the jugglery and frauds which discredited the census in Maryland in 1900. These abuses were directly the outcome of mixing politics with the census. In consequence of the dishonesty of certain census employes the Federal Government was compelled to revise the returns in Maryland and to do the work over again. And because the first returns were fraudulent on their face the State of Maryland was put to the expense of an extra session of the Legislature to provide for taking the census of Maryland by the State government.

GREATEST COMET OF ALL COMING

"Halley's" Will Light up the Entire Heavens.

"If you live until next spring you are going to witness one of the most magnificent sights the heavens have ever disclosed before your eyes," said a well known member of the astronomical force at the United States Naval Observatory to a newspaper correspondent. "Halley's comet comes only once in a lifetime and many persons are born, live and die without ever catching a glimpse of its marvelous dash of fire across the skies. It was last seen in 1835, and few persons now alive can say they have ever witnessed it."

The astronomical world is now on the watch, and huge refracting and reflecting telescopes are trained upon the heavens from many points on the earth in a common effort to locate the comet which is approaching the earth at a terrific rate. There is a friendly rivalry to see which will be the first to pick up the comet with their mirrors.

The comet in its full refulgence is not due until 1910, but by spring it will probably be near enough to be visible by naked eye. In the past it has spanned the heavens almost from horizon to horizon, covering as much as 100 degrees of celestial territory, and standing out like a great living thing of fire. It is now somewhere off in space, but not yet visible to astronomers. They confidently expect someone to pick it up before the end of 1909, and after that it will increase in splendor and size until it reaches its nearest approach to the earth, some time next spring, after which it will disappear, not to be seen again in 75 years.

"Halley's comet has been visiting the vicinity of the earth ever since 500 or 600 years before Christ," said the astronomer. "Halley was an Englishman whose name was given to the comet because he was the first to announce that this particular comet came near the earth at regular periods once every 75 years. He went over the records, and by a series of computations found that what had previously been regarded as a series of different comets, was nothing more than the same comet and that this, the most magnificent of them all, came around regularly once every 75 years. That was during the latter part of the eighteenth century, and Halley announced that this comet would next appear in 1835. He never lived to see it come, but his successors found that his prediction came true."

Retires from Newspaper Work.

Last Friday's Inter-Mountain, published at Elkins, W. Va., says of a native Garrett countian, Rev. J. Ed. Kildow, the preacher-editor of West Virginia:

"Rev. J. Ed. Kildow, for the past eight years an employe of the Inter-Mountain Printing Company, will relinquish newspaper work within the next few days, having accepted a position as field agent for the West Virginia Humane Society. It was largely through Rev. Kildow's endeavors that the local Home of the Humane Society was established in Elkins and to him is due much of the honor for the recent selection of Elkins as the location of the state home soon to be erected. As local agent for the Humane Society he has done efficient work and in his enlarged field of operations his fellowworkers in this office predict and sincerely hope for him a successful career.

"Mr. Kildow will assume his new duties September 1, and will be follow by only the pleasantest recollections and heartiest good wishes of every employe of this office, with whom he has been associated for so many years."

Along with the above very flattering compliment paid Mr. Kildow by the Inter-Mountain, a splendid half-tone of that gentleman is published.

THE REPUBLICAN joins with Mr. Kildow's many friends in wishing him unbounded success in his new occupation.

FOR GOOD ROADS IN THE SOUTH

Four Hundred Dollars in Prizes to be Given.

The Manufacturers' Record offers, for the encouragement of the movement for improved highways in the South, three money prizes, aggregating four hundred dollars, in a competition for the best three articles suggesting the most effective plan for giving the South a system of public highways suited to its needs. The prizes are:

Two hundred and fifty dollars for the best article.

One hundred dollars for the second best article.

Fifty dollars for the third best article.

Competition is free to everyone who reads this announcement, upon the following condition: No article must contain less than 3000 words or more than 5000 words. No article must bear the name of its author, but each article must be signed by a non de plume and enclosed with it must be a sealed envelope bearing the non de plume on its outside and enclosing the real name and address of its author. The small envelopes will not be opened until the winning articles have been selected.

All articles must be addressed, "Editor Good Roads Competition, Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore, Md.," and must be received not later than September 20, 1909. No article received after that date can be considered.

Articles not receiving any of the prizes will be returned to their authors, the Manufacturers' Record reserving the right, however, to publish at its regular space rates to be paid the author any of such articles available for its purpose.

Judgment in the competition will be that of the Manufacturers' Record, and it will turn upon: Clearness of expression in the articles. Practical value of suggestions made.

Importance of facts brought out showing the influence of roads upon material prosperity and social conditions of the South.

This competition is for the purpose of showing what has been done in the several fourteen States of the South under the auspices of State, county or minor local government, through co-operation of citizens or by individual efforts as indicative of what must be done in road building to advance the social and material interest of the South, and with a view to awakening a fuller realization of the need of good roads and of bringing forth suggestions as to how to secure them.

To Extend M. & K.

Information from a reliable source has been received at Fairmont, W. Va., that Senator Elkins has absolutely decided to extend the line of the Morgantown & Kingwood railroad from Rowlesburg to Parsons. The work will begin early next spring.

According to the report a party of consulting engineers were sent over the proposed route within the last few days and a favorable report was made by them. Senator Elkins then told them, it is said, to notify the field engineer to get everything in readiness to begin work with the first warm weather in the spring.

Smoked the Prisoners.

Six prisoners in the Grafton jail set fire to the bedding and sat by and watched the blaze. The prisoners figured on a jail delivery during the excitement. Sheriff Hefner discovered the blaze in a steel-lined cell. To punish the prisoners he locked the cell, which the fire could not damage, and then locked the jail again. The prisoners were smoked almost to suffocation.

Mr. Brown is the only son of Mr. Jacob Brown, of Cumberland.

We note that Mr. D. E. Bolden, of Oakland, Md., a brother of the editor of the Daily Republican, has been nominated by the Republicans of Garrett county for the House of Delegates. As nomination over there is practically equivalent to election, he will doubtless win out on election day; but from what we know of politics, after a good many years study, some application and numerous hot wrestles with the enemy ourselves, we are just a little dubious as to whether we ought to wish him success or go over in Maryland and help elect the other man.—Grafton Republican.

Used Sugar for Sand.

To illustrate how the modern locomotive engineer is trained to such a high plane of efficiency that when the emergency arises he is equal to the occasion, is the caboose story that is being told by B. & O. Engineer Thomas McHugh.

He was going east Wednesday with a heavy train of fast freight, which consisted of several cars of sugar from the St. Louis refineries, and while running over the grade at a fair speed Engineer McHugh was horrified at being told by the fireman that through a defective pipe in the sand dome a half ton of white engine sand had leaked away, crossing the glade, and the engine was without sand.

By skilled maneuvering Mr. McHugh managed to stop at the top of the seventeen mile grade and not wishing to go back for sand remembered the cars of heavy granulated sugar in the train. Quickly breaking into a car a barrel was taken out and hoisted by the train crew on the engine and dumped into the sand dome.

Slowly the train pulled out and started down the hill, when by experimenting it was found that the heavy grain beet sugar was superior to the white Hancock sand.

The train was stopped with the greatest ease at the steepest point on the grade to permit the front brakeman to present a box of candy to his girl at Frankville. Mr. McHugh will hereafter use sugar in preference to sand whenever he can obtain it.

Hurt by Buggy Overturning.

Mrs. Elizabeth Beckwith and Mrs. Goss, returning in the former's buggy from Mountain Lake Park last Sunday afternoon, met with with a mishap as they were turniug into Oak street from Sixth street by the vehicle upsetting and throwing the ladies out. Mrs. Beckwith sustained bruises on her back and her limbs and Mrs. Goss has her shoulder painfully injured.

Mr. E. S. West, as agent for the owner, Mrs. Charles Bosley, has sold the property at the corner of Oak and Fifth streets to Miss Weems, of the Park. The consideration was $2600 cash. Miss Weems will greatly improve the property and will become a permanent resident of Oakland. Mrs. Bosley, who owns the property adjoining will erect a new residende on the site of the old building now standing upon the lot.

FOR SALE—Gasoline Engine in first class condition, 1½ H. P. sufficient to run cream separator, feed cutter, or pump; first cost $100. Will sell with batteries, water connection, cheap. Also one cast kitchen range in first class condition, six holes, water back and front, with connection to hot water tank and warming oven, cost $35. R. E. SLIGER.

Long John Chaney, of Avilton, Garrett county, was in town Tuesday. He is 80 years old, afflicted with cancer of the nose, but resigned and cheerful. He knows that soon or late he has to go, but speaks of the certainty as a matter of fact rather than as an event to be feared or deplored. He is still a democrat of the straight-out guild, now glad that William J. Bryan was not elected because all the blame for the hard times would have been loaded on him. Many men, less afflicted, are unhappier than John Chaney.—Frostburg Journal.

The First National Bank last Thursday received a supply of the new Lincoln pennies. Early visitors to the bank secured specimens of the new coin and spread the news among their acquaintances on the street. In a short time there was a steady stream of applicants for Lincoln pennies pouring in at the door of the institution, and the cashier was kept busy handing out the coins. An effort was made to limit each applicant to five cents, but in several cases the same person called two or three times before the bank officers noticed it.

Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, hands out some bewildering figures regarding crops. They are great for the farmers but a little hard on the rest of us according to the Secretary. He estimates that the crops will be worth $8,000,000,000, or $1,222,000,000 more than last year, the increased production not being due to increased acreage, but to more scientific and better methods of farming. His prediction that prices for farm products will be higher this year than last will please the farmers more than those engaged in other occupations.

Ex-Judge Jacob Feik, of Accident, was in the city Monday when he called at this office and told of a terrific hail and wind storm which passed over the Accident community last Friday afternoon, doing immense damage to crops and fruit trees. The course of the storm was from west to east and seemed to be but half a mile wide. In its path the standing buckwheat was thrashed out so that in many cases it will not pay for the harvesting. Corn was cut to ribbons and beaten to the ground and the crop absolutely ruined. Fruit trees were twisten off and thrown about the orchards like straws. The storm was of only ten minutes' duration but in that time the ground was covered to a depth of several inches with hail and the following morning people living in the vicinity gathered sufficient of the hail stones, which were as large as cherries, to make ice cream.

Gayety at Deer Park.

Midsummer at Deer Park, the Baltimore and Ohio's resort on the crest of the Allegheny mountains, is marked this year with an assemblage of guests representing all sections of the country. The interstate golf, tennis and other out-of-door contests are a feature which contributes immeasurably to the interest, and at times when it is the West vs. the East, or the South vs. the North, one would be justified in thinking some widely exploited tournament was in progress, so keen is the rivalry.

Social features as well are distinguished by the zest all enter into them, and at dances, as likewise at dinners, the toilets displayed rival those of the famous fashion centers of the New England coast.

With midsummer passing into the early fall there is every promise, in the number of present guests announcing their intention to remain, of September proving an especially delightful month. No month is more beautiful in the Alleghenies, and with rains of the recent weeks bringing the wealth of foliage at Deer Park to its loveliest profusion of coloring, the autumnal transformations will be as a gallery of paintings with the chef d'oeuvre changed every day.

It is as August wanes that the seaside sojourners turn mountainward for the restful weeks preceding the return to the whirl of city life, and judging from the bookings, Deer Park is to have large acquisitions of such.

Cottage life, too, at Deer Park this season is marked by an animation and round of social interchange, contributing greatly to the general enjoyment. Cottage, bungalow, or whatever may be the nomenclature employed in the designation of the abode, all are occupied, some of the best known families of Baltimore, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburg, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis continuing the summer through on the mountain top, as they likewise will until, as October nears, they must get back to town. Even then only the imperative leads to the change, for it is very hard to leave the Alleghenies at so gloriously pictorial a time of the year, to say nothing of the bracing air and the invigorating influence of nature as a whole at its very best.

The Kind You Have Always Bought

Bears the Signature of Chas. H. Fletcher

Supt. Nock's Visit to the Mountian.

To the Editor of The Republican:

I purposed last week to write you a letter about my visit to the mountains, but was hindered by many engagements. It was a most enjoyable one in every respect; I was glad to look into the faces of old friends, and to grasp their hands in Christian fellowship.

I have had in past years many pleasant experiences in bear old Garrett, and believe that God has helped me to make an impress for good upon her churches and schools and homes. My voice has been heard in nearly every community pleading in behalf of childhood, and sweet, pure home life, and a religion of love and sacrifice. Judging from the many who greeted me during my recent visit I am not forgotten, nor have my labors been unappreciated.

I lectured on Saturday night, the 14th, to a good audience at Deer Park, on the subject, "How to Keep Jack the Boy from Becoming a Jack of a Man." I I am deeply interested in the boys of this state. If we want a noble, righteous manhood, in the next generation we must care for the boyhood of today. On Sunday morning I visited and addressed the M. E. and Union Sunday schools, and preached at night to a good audienee in the M. E. church.

I returned to Baltimore on the following Wednesday afternoon, after visiting Cumberland, Frostburg and Midland in Allegany county. One of the purposes of my visit was to arrange for a series of conferences later in the season, several of which will be held in Garrett. I believe these will be largely and enthusiastically attended. There will also be held a number of Mothers' meetings, which have been so productive of good in other sections of the state.

I am sure my friends will be glad to know that our cause is moving steadily upward. Results are apparent on every hand, great revivals have followed our meetings; Sunday school and individual workers have been quickened and the cause of God has advanced in many places.

This is the only inter-denominational institution in the state that deals with slum conditions in the city, that visit the islands of the bay, that conveys its blessings to remote mountain sections, that organizes and aids needy Sunday schools, that holds Mothers' Meetings, that looks after the colored childhood of the state, that magnifies the spiritual above the material in church and Sunday school life.

With sincere thanks for the hospitality of friends and their assurances of loyalty. I am fraternally

Proposals for Building Wrought Iron Bridge

Notice is hereby given that the County Commissioners of Garrett County, Maryland, will receive sealed proposals until

Tuesday, September 7, 1909,

at 1 o'clock p. m. at their office in the town of Oakland, Md. for the building of a low truss wrought iron bridge and concrete abutments. The superstructure to consist of one span 36 feet long and 14 feet wide. Said bridge is to be erected across Savage River near residence of D. Winters. The plans submitted shall be for the superstructure, seperate from the substructure, and vice versa. Said bridge to be built according to the plans and specifications to be seen in the County Commissioners' office on and after September 1st, 1909.

The County Commissioners reserve the right to reject any and all bids.

By order of the Board.

IN WHITE DRAPERY

CORRECT FURNISHING FOR THE BEDROOM WINDOW.

Despite All Changes of Fashion That Color Still Holds Its Own, and Is, After All, the Most Appropriate.

With all the changes of fashion in the matter of furnishing, the use of delicate white material for the window draperies of bedrooms continues in favor, for daintiness is the first requisite of such hangings, especially for a woman's bedroom, and nothing can vie with the sheer white hangings in this quality.

Amon the materials which are now most popular for this purpose are very sheer linen—the most expensive of the materials employed—sheer batiste, cotton etamine and India and French lawn. The fashion of the moment calls for the use of very fine embroidery, in delicate rather than elaborate patterns, for hemstitching and other varieties of fine needlework and for the use of very narrow fine lace insertions and edging for the trimmings of such hangings. The idea seems to be to secure fineness of quality and perfection of finish rather than elaboration of detail or striking designs. Among the very newest ideas for trimming these curtains is the employment of narrow white braid to carry out the design, rather than embroidery. This braid, when used for fine material, is most effective. Some of the curtains on which it is used have only the ruffles trimmed, the braid being used in a vine and flower pattern or in a scroll design on the edge of the ruffles. Heavier muslin, that which is quite opaque after embroidering, is also used for these curtains and trimmed with the white braid. The ruffles are then starched and stand out quite stiffly, and in an old-fashioned looking room with chintz fittings this style of curtain is quite effective. Very frequently the ruffles of these curtains are fluted, the braid trimming not being placed on the ruffles, but on the edge of the curtain just inside the ruffle.

For very sheer curtains there is an effective trimming of hemstitching which is to be noticed at some of the most exclusive linen shops where everything is done by hand. To hemstitch a pair of curtains in this fashion would undoubtedly be a task calling for patience and good eyesight, but once accomplished the task would bear lasting fruit, for the wear and tear upon curtains is nothing like so great as that upon bed or table linen, and the curtains, with care, would endure for many years. The hemstitched curtains noticed had a double border of the material hemstitched on both sides and a ruffle with two rows of hemstitching down the sides and around the bottom.

Then the middle of the curtain was also trimmed with the hemstitched bands. The double material formed a rectangle in the center of the curtain and this was hemstitched all around. The material used for these curtains was excessively sheer, and much of the beauty of the curtains depends on this. Care should also be taken to select a material which would not thicken up too much in laundering, as otherwise the effect of the hemstitching would be completely lost.

Is the Chignon Coming Back?

Some intrepid hairdressers maintain that it is. They insist that the mass of puffs and curls worn at the back of the head now is its immediate forerunner. There does seem a long period of possible hair eccentricities between the "Psyche" and the chignon, which was a feature of civil war times; but who knows? Meanwhile let none of us in any capricious moment discard one single puff, coil, ringlet or switch, for if by any chance the "waterfall" should come to town, there is more than likely to be a corner in tresses.

Face Silk Petticoat with Cloth.

Woe be to the petticoat that seeks to ape the frou-frou effects of an earlier favor. It will be pronounced by the sartorially elite a hopeless has-been. If one must wear a petticoat, protest the dressmakers with patient tolerance of one's old-fashioned ideas, let it be of softest satin, the sort that slinks. Let it be scant, and face it up eight inches with something sufficiently heavy to prevent any frivolous tendency to fluff. And one has a directoire petticoat.

ELECTRIC CURING OF MEAT.

By Means of This Invention It Has Been Kept Four Months in the Tropics.

Still another use has been found for electricity—the curing of meat. A process recently perfected will, the originators predict, revolutionize the packing industry and drive the method of curing now in general use out of existence.

For many years inventors have been puzzling their brains over how to apply electricity to meat curing. The idea was public property. It is only recently that it has been applied in a practical way.

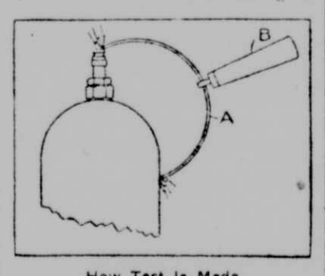
It has long been acknowledged that electricity is the greatest purifier known. Physicians use it to destroy germ life. The purest water is that which has been surcharged with electricity. Accordingly meat has been similarly treated.

A lot of meat which had been electrically cured was boxed and sent to the United States consul at Vera Cruz, Mex. It was protected only by a screen, to keep out rats and mice, and a layer of thin parchment paper.

The consul at Vera Cruz kept the meat four months, then returned it to New York. On its arrival here it passed government inspection. Another piece of meat from the same lot has hung two years in a room where the temperature has never been below 70. It is sweet and wholesome today.

The process in its fundamental principle is simplicity itself. The meat is placed in tanks containing brine. The brine is the same solution which is used in curing establishments everywhere. Electric currents are sent through the tanks. They drive the salt into and through the meat much more quickly and distribute it much more thoroughly than is possible under the old method, in which the meat is merely allowed to soak in the brine.

The originators of the process claim for it that it is quicker, more thorough and more sanitary than the old method.



Even the most up-to-date curing cellars have brine-covered floors and damp walls. The process of curing takes so long and the meat must be handled so many times that perfect sanitation is impossible. The meat must be changed frequently from one hogshead to another, from old brine to new. There is always more or less seepage from leaking casks. The cellars are in layers, underground, and are invariably dark and often poorly ventilated.

With the electric method the meat is handled but once—when it goes into the brine and when it comes out, cured. Therefore there are fewer casks and less seepage. The brine can be used over and over again indefinitely, as it too has been purified by electricity, and circulating through a cooling vat outside returns to the tank.

HOW TO TEST SPARK PLUGS.

It Is a Simple Matter When You Know How.

Where a high-tension magneto is employed for ignition, it is rather difficult to test the spark plugs in order to find which one is misfiring, particularly when the autoist is not sufficiently familiar with the mechanism of the magneto and its internal connections to figure it out on the latter. Of course, on a coil and battery system it is easy enough to hold down one of the vibrators at a time, taking each cylinder in turn and thus locating the trouble, says the Automobile. Or where a dual system of ignition using a set of accumulators and a high-tension magneto operates through the same set of plugs, it is not at all difficult to locate plug troubles, as the battery side may be resorted to, using the coil vibrators in the usual manner. But it is frequently the case that either a single, non-vibrating coil is employed or there are two entirely independent sets of spark plugs. For testing the plugs under such conditions the simple device shown in the illustration will be found very convenient. To make this take a piece of stiff wire, A, several inches in length and bend in a half circle as indicated. At its center fasten a handle, which for convenience sake must be of insulating material, otherwise it will be not a pleasant device to use. The handle from a discarded knife switch will serve the purpose admirably, although a wooden one will do equally well where it is kept dry. To test a plug with the aid of this little device, it is only necessary to bring one end of it in contact with the binding-post on the plug while the other is allowed to rest against the cylinder, or for that matter any other part of the motor, as it serves to short-circuit the plug to which it is applied, so that if the other three cylinders fire regularly during the operation, the plug under test is the one at fault and should be removed. The testing operation may be carried out very quickly.

How Test Is Made.

MANY USES FOR SOUR CREAM.

Among Others, It Makes a Delicious Cabbage Salad Dressing.

It is an amazing thing how much sour cream is thrown away in the summer by careless housewives and ignorant maids, who fail to discover in it the possibilities for innumerable tasty dishes. Sour cream make a delicious cabbage salad dressing, whether used uncooked, stirring it in at the last before serving the salad, or cooking it in this way:

Chop or shred the cabbage fine and put in a deep dish. Put into a saucepan over a hot fire one cupful of thick sour cream and stir in while heating the yolks of three well beaten eggs. Add a half teaspoonful of sugar, two tablespoonfuls of butter, with salt and pepper to taste. While cooking stir in a half cupful of strong vinegar. This makes a smooth, thick dressing, delightfully creamy. Pour over the cabbage while hot and mix thoroughly.

TRY THIS BOSTON TART.

Particularly Appetizing Delicacy for the Dessert.

Two eggs, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one lemon, one level tablespoonful cornstarch, some pastry, one cupful of boiling water. Beat up the yolks of the eggs with the sugar; then add the grated rind and strained juice of the lemon, then add the cornstarch. Mix all these well together; then add the water. Place the basin over a pan of boiling water and stir the mixture for a few minutes until the flour is cooked and loses its raw taste. Roll out the pastry and line a platter or shallow dish with it. Then pour in the mixture, bake it in a hot oven until the pastry is done. Beat up the whites of the eggs stiffly, add sugar and vanilla extract to taste. Heap this meringue over the tart, then return to a cool oven for a minute.

Richmond Maids.

There is a celebrated cheese cake made from a recipe of one of the maids to Queen Elizabeth, and sold in a little pastry shop in Richmond, England. One cupful of sweet milk, one of sour, one of sugar, one of seeded raisins, one lemon, the yolks of four eggs, a pinch of salt. Cut the raisins in small pieces. Put all the milk in the double boiler, and cook until it curds; then strain. Put the curd through a sieve. Beat the sugar and yolks of eggs together, add the grated rind and juice of the lemon, the raisins and the curd. Line little patty pans with pie crust rolled thin. Put a large spoonful of the filling in each and bake in a moderate oven for 20 minutes.

Needle Protectors.

If you knit mittens and lace, buy two small aluminum thimbles, puncture a small hole in each thimble near the rim, and sew a thimble on each end of one-eighth of a yard of narrow silk elastic. Tie a bow of bright ribbon in center of elastic if you wish, and you have a fine protection from the sharp knitting needles, by slipping a thimble over the end of the needles. It also prevents dropping of stitches when the work is lying unprotected in the work basket. All knitters know how easily the needles will slip out of the work, but having one of these thimbles slipped on to each end of the needle this danger is obviated.

Creole Baked Apples.

Core and pare the apples and put them into a baking dish with a little sugar, water and lemon juice, and bake until tender, but not broken. Remove to a serving dish, fill the centers with jelly or marmalade, and pour the liquid from the baking dish over them. Beat the whites of two eggs till dry and add, gradually, two tablespoonfuls of powdered sugar, one-fourth teaspoonful of lemon extract, and half a teaspoonful of vanilla. Put this meringue on top of the apples and bake in a moderate oven eight minutes.

Potatoes Fried with Egg.

Chop cold boiled potatoes into dice. Fry salt pork slices till you have enough pork fat to fry your potatoes a nice brown in. Chop the crisp pork in with the potatoes. Fry potatoes brown, and break over them as many eggs as you need for the amount you have. A small amount needs but one egg, though two makes it nicer. Stir quickly into the potatoes and remove from the fire as soon as the white is partly set. The egg will continue cooking after taking off the stove.

To Bake Fish.

All housekeepers know how difficult it is to wash a pan in which fish has been baked, the glutinous skin of the fish adhering to the pan until vigorous scouring is necessary to remove it. Butter the pan well, and then spread in it a piece of thick waxed paper, preferably the kind used to line cracker boxes. When the fish is baked it can be easily lifted from the paper, which in turn slips easily out of the pan.

Home-Made Curtain Fixtures.

Take the covers of two baking powder cans (one-half pound size), cut a small groove in the side of one to slip in the rod, then tack one on each side of the door frame for brackets; for a rod cut a broom handle the required length to fit the door; either give the rod a coat of paint or shellac.

New Dress for Hash.

Heat a pint of gravy left from a pot roast to make a real brown gravy, add a cup each of boiled spinach, chestnuts, and French mushrooms, chopped and a teaspoonful each of currant jelly and sherry, and thin large slices of cold meat; warm thoroughly and serve with pieces of toast, sliced lemon and watercress.

FINDING FRANCES.

By CARL WILLIAMS.

Copyrighted, 1905, by Associated Literary Press.

"Miss Pollard! This is a surprise indeed! I supposed that you were out west."

Christopher Brooks, boarding the fast train in Philadelphia, motioned to the porter to place his suit case in the section occupied by Frances Pollard and sank into the seat beside her in response to the mute invitation in her eyes.

"I am to visit old school friends," explained the girl. "it is my first visit to New York."

"And you never let me know that you were coming!" Chris' tones were laden with reproach.

"How could I?" defended the girl. "In spite of the fact that you did not answer my last letter, I wrote you that I was coming east and that I should be glad to have you meet me at the station in Chicago and visit between trains."

"Chicago!" echoed Chris. "I went to New York six months ago. I wrote

"I'VE FOUND YOU TWICE INSIDE OF TWO HOURS."

you of the change, and as you did not reply I supposed that you were lost in the social whirl and did not care to waste time in writing when I was so far away."

"You should have known me better than that." The words were simple, but the look accompanying them was eloquent. It seemed to tell Chris that only through faint heartedness had he failed to win his fair lady and that there still might be a chance.

"It seems to be a muddle all around," he said. "The firm were rather angry at my going, though I gave them two weeks' notice, and they knew that I was bettering myself."

"The chances are that they did not forward your letter to me and did not mail my letter to you. I remember that I dropped it into the office mail box. The cashier was a petty sort of person. This may have been one of his revenges."

The many changes which had come to both since their parting furnished a theme for conversation, and the train was pulling into the terminal at Jersey City before it was exhausted.

Exultingly Chris felt that the misunderstanding was all cleared up, and he told himself that it would not be his fault if Frances did not return home an engaged girl.

"Will your friends be here to meet you?" he asked as the porter took their hand bags.

"I told them not to bother," explained Frances. "Bessie's mother is an invalid, and Bess works downtown somewhere. I'll just take a cab to the house. It's uptown. The address is in my grip. I always carry everything in my grip. Then I have only one thing to watch instead of a valise and a purse and perhaps a couple of bundles."

"That's a sensible thing," cried Chris admiringly. "Only you mustn't lose your valise."

"I should say not," agreed Frances laughingly. "I should find myself without money and, worse yet, without even Bess' address, since she had to move last week because their old house was torn down."

"I'll look out for the valise," promised Chris as he helped her down the steps of the Pullman. "Better walk behind me and let me force the way. I'm more used to New York crowds," he explained, with the pride of a new resident.

Now, at Jersey City the concourse opens on three ferry slips, all leading to various parts of Manhattan. Chris headed for the downtown ferry, which would bring them near the subway, and not until the boat was reached did he turn to see if the girl was still following.

The gates were closed behind him and the boat was slowly passing out of the slip when he made the discovery that Frances had not followed his instructions.

She was not in the tail of the crowd that had been hurried aboard by impatient gatemen, nor did a careful search of the boat reveal her, and Chris' hope that she might have been swept aboard by the other gangway was dashed.

He made the return trip on the same boat, railing at the delay, and after a hurried scrutiny of the concourse decided that she must have taken the upper ferry to Twenty-third street.

A boat was about to start, and he rushed on board, the perspiration streaming from his face. He still carried Frances' valise and his own heavy suit case. Frances could not leave any ferry house without the valise, for it contained her money and her friend's address. She could not apply to the old address to find out where her hostess had moved, because the house had been torn down. She must wait for him.

He dashed through the exit and through the waiting room, searching both floors, but there was no trace of the girl. He was about to go to the street and question the carriage agent when the doorman, who had watched his actions curiously, came up.

"Are you the chap that lost a lady?" he demanded. "If you are, I told her to go back to the Jersey side and wait for you. She followed a man she thought was you and got on the wrong boat."

Chris pressed a coin into the man's hand and sprinted down the slip just as the boat was pulling out. He barely managed to leap aboard before the gates were closed, and he stood on the forward deck to cool off.

When the boat should make the Jersey shore this worry would be at an end. So he regarded the panorama of river life complacently.

He was the first passenger off the boat and out on to the concourse, but neither on the concourse nor in the waiting room could he find her, though he searched both. She must have boarded the Cortlandt street ferry, so for a second time he made for the slip, catching the same boat that had carried him across before. One of the deck hands regarded him curiously as he passed.

"Ain't you the fellow what paid his fare to me to stay on the boat a couple of trips ago?" he demanded.

Chris nodded, and the man grinned. "I thought you was," he continued. "There was a lady down here looking for you this last trip. I remembered you went right back, and I sent her on to Twenty-third street. She didn't have the price of her fare," he added meaningly, and again the grateful Chris passed out a coin.

"Funny you didn't see her," mused the man as he slipped the money into his pocket. "She was on the boat when we landed. I told her to take a look around and then make for the Twenty-third street slip.

"I was looking in the waiting room for her," explained Chris. "I guess it'll be all right now."

But things were far from all right. When Chris leaped from the boat at the uptown landing, the doorman who had spoken to him before laughed loudly as he caught sight of the panting and perspiring traveler.

"I told you to wait on the Jersey side," he cried. "The girl came back, and I told her you were down there waiting. The man on one of the Cortlandt street boats sent her up here while I was sending you back. I told her to sit there in the shed this time for an hour and I'd find you somehow. Better stay on this boat. The fare's 3 cents. You owe a ticket for her too. She didn't have any money."

Chris passed over a dollar. "Keep the change; it's worth it," he said, and he went back on the boat.

Fifteen minutes later the crowd surged off the boat in a rush for the trains, and Chris went with the tide of humanity until it separated toward the various gates.

As he turned to search the seats a pair of soft arms went about his neck, and he looked down into Frances' crimson face.

"I didn't mean to do that," she cried, "but I was so afraid I'd lose you again if I didn't grab right hold of you."

"I like it," declared Chris. "I thought I never should find you."

"That's the way it seemed to me," she confessed. "I never was so glad to see any one in my life. A fat woman came in between us, and when I looked around to find you there were two men who looked so like you that I wasn't certain which was really you. They were both going toward the uptown boat, and I followed them."

Chris transferred the valise to the hand that carried his suit case, and with the other he grasped her arm.

"I'm not going to lose you this time," he announced. "I don't want ever to lose you again, Fanny. May I keep you—always?"

What he saw in her eyes caused him to lean over and kiss her.

"Everybody kisses everybody else at the railroad station," he explained as he led the way to the boat. "And they haven't half my excuse. I've found you twice inside of two hours."

The Old Time Shawl.

The shawl was originally not a woman's garment exclusively, for the Scotch highlander has his tartan plaid, and the men of northern Italy still wear a cloak which is very little more than a shawl. There can be no question that the shawl is more useful and more picturesque as an article of attire than the close fitting coats both men and women now wear. The shawl could in case of emergency be used to protect two persons or to wrap a child in or as an extra bed covering. If fashion did not change every three months, and it could be used and passed down to the family until it was worn out. Nowadays the only time when such articles are used is when people are making an ocean trip or traveling in Europe. "Traveling rugs," which are neither more or less than men's heavy shawls, are extremely English, and for travelers they are considered very proper and desirable, but outside of a steamer, train or carriage no one who cares for what people will say would be seen with one.—Argonaut.

THE PUBLIC EYE.

In a little more we came to an open space, very thronged.

"The Public Eye," shouted the megaphone man of our party.

There were some curious people within the space but even more curious were those just outside.

Of these latter we thought certain women especially interesting; they were busily neglecting their families in order to get into the Public Eye. A pathos attached to another group of women who had been in the Public Eye and could never be happy out of it, though they couldn't in the least tell why.

Positively funny were a few men who kept trying, by a variety of droll devices, to break into the Public Eye. "Vice-presidential candidates!" our megaphone man explained.—Puck.

The Cause of Vernal Verdancy.

"Why?" he was asked.

Why American Criminal Laws Fail of Their Purpose.

By CHARLES J. BONAPARTE, Attorney General of the United States.

AMERICAN criminal law today has very serious defects. In fact, in a large measure it fails of its purpose.

I WOULD NOT HAVE THE LAW SO CHANGED AS TO REMOVE ANY SUBSTANTIAL SAFEGUARD TO TRUE INNOCENCE. I WOULD, HOWEVER, SEE THE LAW PURGED OF VARIOUS OBSOLETE AND OBSTRUCTIVE RULES OF PROCEDURE OR PROOF WHICH IN PRACTICE SERVE ONLY TO PROVIDE LOOPHOLES OF ESCAPE FOR BRAZEN GUILT.

For example, grand juries should not be abolished. But the practice which has grown up in certain jurisdictions of minutely revising the action of grand juries and quashing indictments because evidence technically inadmissible was submitted or this or that comparatively trivial matter of form was inadvertently neglected is unreasonable and mischievous.

But of all those peculiarities which are helpful to "undesirable citizens" the gravest and least excusable deficiency is found in ENDLESS DELAYS.

WHY NEED THERE BE A FORETASTE OF ETERNITY BETWEEN ARREST AND INDICTMENT, BETWEEN INDICTMENT AND TRIAL, BETWEEN TRIAL AND ACTUAL PUNISHMENT?

Partly because the bench and the bar tolerate dilatory, frivolous and often ridiculous proceedings by unscrupulous counsel intended to CHEAT JUSTICE; partly because our lawmakers afford almost infinite facilities for review of judicial action to the criminal, although very stingy in allowing them to the government; mainly because our laws show LITTLE SENSE OF THE VALUE TO SOCIETY of a speedy administration of justice. We have small judicial districts, intermittent sessions of our criminal courts, judges sometimes overworked, sometimes indolent; prosecutors sometimes overburdened by their duties, sometimes politicians rather than lawyers. All this makes for delay, and all that makes for delay makes against the EFFICACY OF THE CRIMINAL LAW.

WHEN THE PEOPLE OF AN AMERICAN STATE OR THE AMERICAN NATION DECREE DEATH TO WHOMSOEVER SHALL DO THUS AND THUS AND THEN LET THE TRANSGRESSOR LIVE FOR MONTHS AND YEARS, WHILE LAWYERS WRANGLE AND JURIES DISAGREE AND JUDGES REVERSE EACH OTHER, THERE IS ROOM FOR DOUBT, AND DOUBT IN FACT, WHETHER THE STATE OR NATION DOES, IN TRUTH, MEAN BUSINESS. THAT SOVEREIGN PUNISHES WITH DOUBLE EFFICACY AND TRIPLE CERTAINTY WHO PUNISHES WHILE THE CRIME IS RANK AND RECENT.

Success of a Community Depends on Its Provincialism.

By Professor JOSIAH ROYCE of Harvard University.

PROVINCIALISM is necessary to the town, the city and the country. A community must be SELF RESPECTING and cannot wisely live by taking over the customs of other people. A stranger must win his place in the social standard. The new life must come of its own life, and the new blood must flow in its own veins. The community must not be influenced by visitors or intruders. The summer visitor or the immigrant must be made to understand that he cannot destroy the provincialism. If he does have any influence in that regard, the community is in danger of MORAL DEATH and the home becomes an abandoned farm in the spiritual world.

THE SUCCESS OF A COMMUNITY LIES IN ITS DETERMINATION TO LIVE ITS OWN LIFE, NOT SELFISHLY, HOWEVER; TO HAVE A FIRM SOCIAL AUTHORITY TOWARD NEWCOMERS AND SOJOURNERS THAT SHOWS IT HAS A DIGNITY TO ASSERT AND TO HAVE A SPIRIT OF LOCAL PATRIOTISM.

The nation itself is in danger of becoming self estranged by the ABSENCE OF PROVINCIALISM. However, there is in large numbers the "silent voter" who cares not how long the shouting lasted at a certain convention and who is careful, thoughtful and decisive. He is the man who allows no agitation to mislead him, no political trickster to inflame his judgment and no newspaper to make noise enough to deafen to his ear the proper spirit.

Our Debt to School Athletics.

By Dr. C. WARD CRAMPTON, Director of Physical Training in New York City Schools.

IS THE AMERICAN BOY GROWING BIGGER AND HEAVIER? ARE OUR YOUNG MEN NEARER THE PHYSICALLY IDEAL THAN WERE THE YOUNG MEN OF TWENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO? AND ARE WE DEVELOPING INTO A RACE WITH BETTER PHYSIQUES, BETTER ATHLETES AND BETTER ALL ROUND MEN? THESE ARE QUESTIONS OF VITAL INTEREST, AND I CAN SAFELY ANSWER THEM ALL IN THE AFFIRMATIVE.

Within the last five years we have introduced athletics into the schools, so that we have now hundreds of teams in baseball, football, basket ball and track athletics where there was one before. Now a boy can hardly escape some kind of athletic work in which he can represent his school. Already the colleges are reporting that the young men entering them are BIGGER than they were years ago.

The American soldier is now five feet seven and a half inches tall, and he is heavier and has a larger chest girth than any soldier in any other country except the Scandinavian.

IT IS CERTAINLY TRUE THAT AMERICANS ARE BECOMING LARGER AND STRONGER AND MORE EFFICIENT EVERY YEAR, AND I ATTRIBUTE IT TO THE FACT THAT THE AMERICAN BOY HAS NOW COME INTO HIS HERITAGE OF ATHLETIC SPORTS.

The attention to formal gymnastics, games and play in the public schools is laying a foundation for the continuance of exercise in the form of athletics which will become the NATURAL THING for our boys and girls when they go out into the world.

ILL WIND'S GOOD.

By CHARLES GRAVES.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

A flood of golden morning sunshine streaming through the windows and falling full upon his face awakened Tom Goodhue. It awakened him with a rather unpleasant start and brought to his mind the disquieting suspicion that he had overslept.

He came out of bed with a bound and looked at his watch. It was 9:30—half past 9, and he had an appointment to go sailing with Helen Caverly at 9 sharp! Surely the gods of misfortune severally and collectively were following in his train!

He dressed in record breaking time, bounded down the stairs and, breakfastless, made all speed to the long pier in front of the hotel, his mind busy with the many apologies he would undoubtedly need in a few moments.

But the apologies were doomed, for the present at least, to remain unspoken, for when he reached the pier he saw, running out of the harbor before the smart breeze, a knockabout with a well known pennant fluttering from the mast.

Evidently Miss Caverly had grown weary of waiting for him. Goodhue took a long, lugubrious look at the distant sail and groaned.

Yet he was not the man to submit tamely to adverse circumstances. At the end of the pier lay hope in the shape of his own power boat, pulling at her painter as she swung to the tide. In a moment he had scrambled aboard, pulled the cover from the engine and turned over the flywheel.

There was a series of sharp reports. He threw off the moorings, sprang to the little wheel in the bow, and the power boat went tearing away from the pier, sending up twin waves of white spume at her bow as she sped in pursuit of the distant knockabout.

The engine of a power boat, however, is not one of the things to be classed among such certainties as death and taxes. Scarcely had he passed the can buoy on the outer ledge when there was an ominous coughing of the exhaust.

Immediately it grew spasmodic and seemed to take a half hearted, despairing note. Then it ceased altogether, and with this cessation the little craft lay helpless on the long swells coming in from the bay.

Countless precedent cases had taught Goodhue what to do. He pulled off his coat, caught up a wrench and attacked the engine, not without a certain grim wrath.

At the end of half an hour, despite all his art and all his mad efforts with the wrench, the engine, beyond a few derisive, choking puffs, refused to respond.

Goodhue hurled the wrench angrily into the locker, shook a vindictive fist at the balky machinery and delivered himself of his opinions concisely and forcefully.

Then he looked despairingly at the sail momentarily growing smaller to the eastward and ruefully surveyed the blue streak of shore behind him, not without certain poignant longings for breakfast.

All his labors had merely succeeded in getting him stalled here in the middle of the bay. He grunted his disgust, tied his handkerchief to a boat hook as an improvised signal of distress and set it up in the stern. Then he stretched himself upon the cushions and calmly went to sleep.

He was awakened by rippling laughter. He jumped up to find close alongside a knockabout with its sail rattling sharply as it headed into the wind. By the tiller was Helen Caverly, her eyes sparkling as she took in his plight.

Goodhue struck a melodramatic attitude, one hand on his forehead, the other at his throat.

"Help!" he cried, nodding toward his distress signal.

The girl laughed again.

"What on earth are you doing out here so early in the morning?" she said mockingly. "Are you aware that it is but a trifle past 10:30?"

"I am pursuing you," said he, "or, rather, I was pursuing you until this—this moment—when engine went back on me."

"And why were you pursuing me?"

"I wanted that sail you promised me this morning."

"I waited for you until long after 9."

Goodhue grinned sheepishly. "I—I overslept," he confessed meekly. "Then when I got down to the pier and found you gone I started out in the power boat—without any breakfast."

"What noble self sacrifice!" she mocked.

"And I'd have caught you, too, but for that engine. It always breaks down when you want it most. However, you've seen my plight and come alongside, and that's the main thing, after all. We can have that sail now, can't we?"

"Do you think she deserves it?"

"Frankly, I don't, but I'm going to trust to your generosity."

She looked at him doubtfully for a moment. "Of course," she said at length, "I can't desert you like this, helpless as you are upon the high seas. Come aboard. I'll tow you back. You must be very hungry by this time."

Goodhue caught up the boat hook, pulled the power boat alongside the knockabout and scrambled over her rail. In a moment the painter was fast, and, towing the helpless craft behind her, the knockabout was headed shoreward.

The girl held the tiller. Goodhue sat down beside her.

"I was particularly anxious to come out sailing with you this morning," said he.

"So it would seem," she observed dryly.

"There was a very particular reason why I shouldn't miss it," he went on placidly, ignoring her tone. "I wanted to finish out what I was saying to you night before last on the Gregorys' piazza when that idiot of a Benson came out and interrupted us."

A wave of color surged into the girl's cheek. Her nose went up in the air a fraction of an inch.

"Under the circumstances," said she, "considering the fact that I have just rescued you from a rather trying situation, it seems to me no gentleman would take advantage" —

Goodhue moved closer to her.

"No gentleman would have missed his appointment with you this morning," said he. "Therefore I am no gentleman. Following out the same course of logic, the fact that I am no gentleman absolves me from playing the gentleman's part of silence just now. I will take the tiller, Helen."

He took it. The girl began hastily trimming the sheet.

"I am going to finish out that proposal," he declared. "If you won't listen to me I shall refuse to be saved. I shall return to the power boat and trust myself to the mercies of these treacherous waters," he ended, looking tragically at the quiet sea about them.

"Besides which," he went on, "kindly remember that I have had no breakfast. Will you listen?"

The girl turned to him with flushed face, but her eyes were shining.

"You certainly must have that breakfast," she chuckled. "Go ahead. I am all attention."

London Fog.

A London fog brings out hundreds of thieves, but it also brings out men who are wanted by the police. A detective told a representative of the press about two curious instances of thieves being caught in this way:

We had been on the lookout for weeks for a swindler who had stolen bonds in his possession. The inspector who had the warrant at last declared that the man must have got out of the country. But one densely foggy night the inspector happened to be in a quiet street not far from Bedford square, when a stranger, against whom he nearly ran, said:

"Can you tell me precisely where I am? I've got mixed up somehow."

"Follow me and I'll show you," said the officer. And he did show him—to the police station, for the man was the very one he had been looking for.

In another case a sergeant, in one of the thickest fogs ever known, politely helped a lady in distress near the Kensington road. The lady couldn't even recognize her own house among several all alike, and the sergeant, on her behalf, knocked at a door and was answered by a man.

The lady did not live there, but an hour or two afterward I arrested the man who had come to the door. He was a German baker, the head of a large firm, and we had been seeking him for months.

The Man In the House.

The hour was midnight in the home of the Ramscatters. The family consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Ramscatter and their young son, George, almost at the age of maturity. All had retired when suddenly a loud yell penetrated the air.

"There's a man in the house!"

The alarm awakened mother and father. They jumped up, screaming:

"Where? Where?"

"Here!"

It was George's voice. Ramscatter proceeded cautiously across the hall to his son's room with a revolver in one hand. He was followed by his wife.

"George, are you injured?" shouted the father.

"There's a man in the house!" came the reply.

Ramscatter prepared to fire as he threw open the door.

"I don't see any man!" he exclaimed as he flashed on the electric lights.

"He's right here," answered the son.

"What do you mean, George?"

"I mean that it's now five minutes after 12 o'clock. Today is my birthday, and I'm twenty-one years old."—Bohemian Magazine.

CLEVER IDEA FOR GARTER.

Woman Seems to Have Satisfactorily Solved a Problem.

So many women complain that the patent fasteners on the garters, which are attached to the corset, tear out the stockings, but there is a clever woman who has found a way out of the difficulty. She sews two bits of white tape to the top of her stockings and places them so they are each just where the patent fasteners usually come in contact with the stocking. She then removes the fasteners from the garters and uses, in their stead, little pieces of ribbon which match the color used in her corset cover. When she puts on her stocking in the morning she slips the ribbon in the loop of the garter and then through the tape in her stocking, tying the end in a neat bow.

Not only does this method save the stockings and lengthen their period of usefulness, but it makes a pretty finish far more dainty than the patent fastener could possibly be.

The form of the arrangement might even be varied. Brown tape might be fastened on brown stockings and one might even have a bit of brown ribbon. Again, a buttonhole might be worked in the top of the stocking, in which case the tape might be dispensed with. Surely it would be better to even go to that much trouble than to spend countless hours in the uncongenial task of mending slipped threads.

CLOAK AND GOWN COMBINED.

French Creation Built on Fashionable Greek Lines.

One of the season's offerings in the realm of clothes is a combination garment which is a dress and a cloak in one. The creation is a French one, as one might readily surmise, and it is built on the fashionable Greek lines. When it is worn as a gown there is a long, graceful hanging skirt having drapery around the hips which is caught up to the gown at either side with a fancy braid ornament. With perfect ease one side of this drapery can be detached from the skirt and lifted to one shoulder, thus converting the costume into a semi-wrap affair. By following the same method with the other side of the skirt, the drapery can be attached to the shoulder and the costume becomes a gown, over which is worn a very handsome, long draped mantle reaching almost to the edge of the train and caught up in artistic folds in front.

FEATHER RUFFS FOR NECK.

Expensive to Buy, But Are Not Hard to Make at Home.

It is quite fashionable now to wear around the neck a close-fitting ruff made of an ostrich feather of small tips. This has extra wide white ruching above and sometimes below. The feathers are secured with a tight-fitting satin band, which ends over the hooks and eyes with a rosette and two short streamers.

These are expensive to buy, therefore the woman who has small feathers put away can accomplish such a ruff at home during the morning hours. Steaming the feathers and recurling them with a scissor blade will put them in good condition. The ruff should fit the neck and be worn over a stock with a coat suit.

COAT FOR STREET WEAR.

Vagaries of Fashion.

The change that has come about in fastening blouses in the front instead of the back has been almost imperceptible, but the change in collars has been made over night.

Isn't it the irony of fate that no sooner does fashion arrange it that women can have comfort in a blouse that fastens in front, fashion also arranges it to twist the collar around and fasten it at the back!

The comfortable turnover linen collar now meets at the back, fastens in the ordinary way, except that its edges must be brought together with hooks and eyes or bar pins. There is no opening in front, and a large bow or jabot or other kind of ornament is put at the front.

A Softening Frill.

There is no disguising the fact that without the immense and lovely jabots, stocks and frilled puffs the present styles would be angular and severe to an unbecoming degree. The softening frill does much to hide the severity of the season's costumes.

It is the opinion of the many that women are more furbelowed this year than ever before, but if all those frills were deducted women would look as mannish as they did on the street last year.

WHEN THE PHRENOLOGIST FELL.

His Knowledge of Horses Was Evidently a Weak Point.

Mayor Reyburn of Philadelphia told at a dinner a horse story.

"A farmer visited a phrenologist," he said. "He had heard that the phrenologist thought of buying a horse. He had his head examined and his bumps revealed surprising things.

"'Your tastes are the simple, homely and pure tastes of a farmer,' said the phrenologist, 'and a farmer I take you to be. Am I not right? Aha, I thought so. You are unready and faltering in speech; you find it difficult to express the simplest ideas. You are sadly deficient in judgment and have no knowledge of human nature. Your innocent and trustful disposition renders you an easy dupe to designing men, and your own perfect honesty prevents you from either suspecting or defrauding any one.'

"The phrenologist the following week bought a horse from the farmer. The horse was knock-kneed, it was 25 years old, it had a bad temper, and it balked. Though the farmer had only paid $15 for the animal, he secured without difficulty $150 from the phrenologist for it.

"'It's wonderful,' said the farmer to himself, as he hastened toward the bank to deposit the money—'it's jest wonderful that a man should know so much about men and not know a thing about hosses!'"—Detroit Free Press.

ALWAYS SOURCE OF WEAKNESS.

Pretense Detracts from the Power to Accomplish.

There is nothing which will add so much to one's power as the consciousness of being absolutely sincere, genuine. If your life is a perpetual lie, if you are conscious that you are not what you pretend to be—that you are really a different person from what the world regards you—you are not strong.

There is a restraint, a perpetual fighting against the truth going on within you, a struggle which saps your energy and warps your conduct. If there is a mote at the bottom of your eye you cannot look the world squarely in the face.

Your vision is not clear. Everybody sees that you are not transparent. There is a cloudiness, a haze about your character, which raises the interrogation point where you go. Character alone is strength, deceit is weakness, sham and shoddy are powerless, and only the genuine and the true are worth while.—Exchange.

Blessings of Idleness.

Perpetual devotion to what a man calls his business is only to be sustained by perpetual neglect of many other things. And it is not by any means certain that a man's business is the most important thing he has to do. To an impartial estimate it will seem clear that many of the wisest, most beneficent parts that are to be played upon the theater of life are filled by gratuitous performers, and pass among the world at large as phases of idleness. For in that theater not only the working gentlemen, singing chambermaids and diligent fiddlers in the orchestra, but those who look on and clap their hands from the benches, do really play a part and fill important offices toward the general result.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

"The Devil and the Deep Sea."

Hazlitt's "English Proverbs" gives the proverb as "Betwixt the devil and the Dead sea," and quotes it from Clarke's "Paroemiologia," 1639, and adds this note of explanation: "On the horns of a dilemma. In Cornwall they say 'deep' sea, which may be right." Reddall's "Fact, Fancy and Fable" gives the following explanation of the proverb: "This expression is used by Col. Monroe in his 'Expedition with Mackay's Regiment,' printed in London in 1637. The regiment was with the army of Gustavus Adolphus and was engaged in a battle with the Austrians. The Swedish gunners did not elevate their guns sufficiently, and their shot fell among this Scottish regiment, so that 'we were between the devil and the deep sea.'"

A Long Sentence.

The prize for the longest sentence ever written may fairly be awarded to the elder Dumas, who probably holds a further record for fertility of production. In the seventh of the 29 volumes which compose the "Impressions de Voyage," there is a sentence describing Benvenuto Cellini, which fills three pages, or 108 lines, averaging 45 letters apiece. The sentence is broken by 68 commas and 60 semicolons; but as it contains 195 verbs and 122 proper names, the reader is somewhat bewildered before the end is reached.

Wise Men.

Although a wise man is exacting toward himself he does not demand anything of others. He is content with his lot and never complains of heaven. He never blames others for his fate—therefore, when he finds himself in a low state, he submits to fate. An ordinary mortal, seeking earthly bliss, falls into dangers.

When the arrow does not hit the target he who shoots it blames only himself and no one else. Even so does the wise man act.—Confucius.

COL. ROOSEVELT DISPATCHES HIS FIRST ELEPHANT.

Kills a Magnificent Specimen in the Jungles Near Kinia Camp.

NAIROBI, British East Africa, Aug. 23.—Colonel Roosevelt has killed his first elephant, and he is elated at the fact. The big pachyderm fell a victim to the former President's shots Saturday, while Colonel Roosevelt, hunting with only a native gun bearer, was beating the jungles near his camp at Kinia, the "mountain of whiteness," an extinct volcano.

The beast the colonel killed was a magnificent specimen of a bull elephant and will make a valuable acquisition for the Smithsonian Institution.

Leaving Guide Cunninghame and Major Heller, the Smithsonian Institution's taxidermist, to skin the massive beast and pickle the hide for shipment to America, Mr. Roosevelt has gone, accompanied by his gun bearers, to hunt in the vicinity of Lake Mweru. Kermit, accompanied by a few guides, is hunting in the vicinity of Guaso Nyro, where he expects to bag some big game and to get some photographs to add to his collection.

The last few days the party had to make long marches over a practically waterless country. At the end of the first day, when they reached the water hole they had been making for, they found it dried up and had to camp without water. Worse still, the food supplies had almost given out and all had to go on half rations.

Mr. Roosevelt made fine shooting and bagged a very large hippo in great style in a most sportsmanlike manner, shooting it from a small and frail row boat at close quarters at the moment the beast was charging. As the day was drawing to a close he returned to camp and everyone was loud in his praise of Mr. Roosevelt's fine shooting.

Capt. Atterborough returned to Natvasha the next day in his launch to get fifty loads of rice for the porters' rations and the collapsible boat belonging to the expedition.

The scientists have bagged some fine mammals, monkeys and birds, and Kermit Roosevelt also has secured his hippo, consequently Saigai-Sai has proved a very successful camping place.

Mr. Tariton rode to Naivasha by moonlight a few nights later, followed for some miles by five lions. This route around the lake is infested with lions, and there is every chance of the party having some sport when it comes in.

One of the party was chased in at night by three lions on the same road not many days ago.

Maryland's Foremost Technical School.

The Maryland Agricultural College, the widespread importance of which as the state's school of technology, is being more and more keenly realized all the time, will open its fifty-third year on September 14.

Every indication points to this as the most successful year in the history of the institution, which has the distinction of being the first and oldest agricultural college in the United States.

Within the past few years rapid strides forward have been taken and the college is today thoroughly equipped for its great work of training young men to hold their own in the struggle for existence.

With the completion of the new engineering building, the plans for a fine and thoroughly modern agricultural building, a strengthened faculty and a new athletic field, the college will this year present opportunities and attractions for the education of young men along scientific, engineering and agricultural lines, unrivalled in this state and unsurpassed in any other.

The institution as it stands today is one in which the state and the people of Maryland may well take pride. It means more to the welfare of the State and its general development along broad lines than any other educational institution within its borders. It is doing and has done more for the development of the natural resources of Maryland than any other agency, and it is now upon a foundation and in a position where its usefulness will be doubled and its sphere of activity greatly widened.

Since last year new courses have been added to the curriculum, and the two years' courses in agriculture and horticulture revised and amplified. Dr. R. W. Silvester and the members of his faculty have devoted themselves this summer to the work of preparing for what it is proposed to make the banner year in the history of this old and honorable school.

One of the things of greatest value about the Maryland Agricultural College is the ability of its graduates to obtain positions of importance and responsibility upon leaving college.

Its graduates have made the name and fame of M. A. C. more than state wide—in the ranks of farmers, engineers, lawyers, physicians, scientific specialists and business men, they are found in the forefront, and their universal success in the calling for which they were prepared at College, is an object lesson which cannot escape the notice of a discerning and intelligent public.

SWANTON.

The gathering Wednesday in Cumberland of distinguished gentlemen to renominate the Hon. A. Hunter Boyd for a second term of fifteen years as Chief Judge of this Judicial Circuit and presiding Judge of the Court of Appeals at Annapolis, was of an order well calculated to arouse pride with the usual man; and the earnest and extraordinary procedings of the convention indicated the public anxiety for the retention of Judge Boyd in the position he now fills.

As soon as the customary organization and preliminaries had been concluded, ex-Judge Ferdinand Williams, himself a Judge of established ability, rose and presented Judge Boyd for renomination. Judge Williams confined himself closely to his written speech and was followed with eager attention. His speech was an able and exhaustive presentation of the subject and from it we have a few of his statements as follows: "Judge Boyd has taken a part in nearly all of the decisions of the Court of Appeal reported in 30 volumes, from the 78th to the 108th volume of Maryland Reports, and has written 328 opinions reported in these volumes volumes. He has taken part in two thousand decisions of the Court of Appeals. In the Circuit Courts of Allegany, Garrett and Washington, he has decided several thousand cases. So great has been the confidence of lawyers and litigants in his knowledge of the law and of his sense of justice that only 23 appeals have been taken from his judgments, of which 20 were affirmed by the higher court and only three reversed. He has written three opinions in cases of the Court of Appeals at Annapolis from which appeals were taken to the Supreme Court of the United States and all three were affirmed by that high Court—the highest to which an appeal can be taken." The address of Judge Williams abounded in these striking facts, showing what industry, accuracy and devotion to duty have accomplished in this term of sixteen years. Attorney Gilmor S. Hamill, for Garrett, seconded the nomination in an excellent address which was well received and liberally applauded. For Washington county, ex-Judge William J. Witzenbacher, read an elaborately penned paper, clear in style and chaste in expression and rousing much enthusiasm in the convention. It was an admirable production and so thorough in its accomplishments that not one of the several distinguished speakers present from that county attempted to add a word to Judge Witzenbacher's address. Mr. David J. Lewis, of Allegany, also read a paper splendidly written and animating in tone.

Now, Mr. Editor, in sober language and with the best intentions, we have more than once called upon you to send a good Doctor to Swanton and, so far as we can see, you have not given the request a passing thought. At this writing Mr. George McKenzie, an old soldier of the Civil War, is very ill with typhoid fever; a son of Mr. Jerry Mankis is seriously ill, and we are borrowing doctors from neighboring towns. We have much more sickness from less alarming maladies—a doctor is in daily need at Swanton.

Apropos to Courts: Not long since your correspondent happened to be one of many spectators at an early hour in Garrett's new and bright court room and saw there what pleased him as greatly as any demonstration of politeness ever pleased him in any court. When the Justices walked from their room to seats at the bench, in a dignified way the entire bar rose as one man, and continued standing in a deferential attitude until each Judge was seated. In so graceful an acknowledgment the bar did credit to itself in the manifestation of esteem for such a court as is ours.

Since our last for your columns, Mrs. Ella West, of Baltimore, has arrived in Swanton on a visit to relatives.

With last Sunday evening, August 15, 1909, the first of a series of services to continue for a week or more, commenced in the church of the Rev. Brumbaugh. While the pastor will be present, it is explained, each evening, the sermon will be preached by Miss Mabel Dickey, of West Virginia. This novelty in a Swanton chancel stimulated no small interest in the community. "In thunder, lightning and in rain," we went twice to these services, and found Miss Dickey to be a young lady of pleasing personality, gentle in manner and conservative in conduct. Her reading is exceptionally clear and in good taste, and her addresses are strictly Biblical, prudently directed and delightfully free from extravagant tendencies.

RELLIM.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The Chautauqua closed last night with the largest audience of the season, and probably the largest for the past two or three years. The attendance for the entire season was better than last year. There is a more hopeful feeling for the future of the Park than for several years, and should we get natural gas the Park will grow and flourish.

A very pleasant feature of the last day of the program was the serving of meals in the old auditorium by the ladies of the M. E. church for the benefit of the parsonage fund. This feature should be continued on account of the convenience and comfort of our visiting excursionists and the purpose to which the proceeds are applied. The net proceeds amounted to over one hundred dollars.

Mr. L. P. Carr will improve his cottage by raising it and placing it upon a solid foundation. Mr. Gibson will do the work. Should we get natural gas Mr. Carr will come early and stay late and possibly come up during the winter and spend a few weeks.

The base ball game here yesterday between the Park and Piedmont clubs resulted in a crushing defeat for the home team. The score was 14 to 2 in favor of Piedmont.

A number of lots will likely be sold in the near future and several cottages may be erected before the opening of next season.

Dr. McIntire and family, of New Martinsville, W. Va., are here and the Doctor expects to locate here or in Loch Lynn for the practice of his profession.

Mr. Isaac Leighton, aged about 85 years and residing with his son, Mr. H. V. Leighton, in Loch Lynn, was struck by a freight car running into the south siding here Monday morning, and painfully injured. Dr. H. W. McComas rendered surgical aid and the aged gentleman is now out of danger.

Among the prominent people on the grounds yesterday we noted Revs. J. H. Funk, of Blaine, W. Va., and D. W. Wagner, of Red Lyon, Pa.

There were but two candidates on the grounds yesterday: Messrs. Andrew Shartzer and A. G. Ross.

BITTINGER.

A very heavy hail storm passed over this region last Friday afternoon. Hail stones half as large as a hen egg fell and did much damage to farm crops and garden plants.

During the electrical storm on last Friday afternoon the eight year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Perry Bowser was struck by lightning and for hours she lay in an unconscious condition, but we learn that the stricken child is recovering.

Mrs. Elias Lohr is confined to her home by an attack of typhoid fever.

F. M. Bittinger and wife spent last Sunday with relatives over in Somerset county, Pennsylvania

Mrs. Morgan and children, of High Point, N. C., who spent several weeks in this village, returned to their Southern home on Thursday of last week.

John Miller, of Grantsville, was surveying some timber land in this neighborhood last Monday.

Misses Effie and Cora Bittinger spent last Saturday and Sunday visiting relatives in Grantsville.

STOYER.

These cold nights which leave behind them faint traces of frost, recall to our minds that the Autumn is upon us.

Thos. Robinson and Thos. Hart, both of Upper Potomac, were in this community Sunday.

Mrs. Katharine Moreland, of Kearney, Md., spent a part of last week visiting friends and relatives in and near town.

G. N. Steyer spent last week in Terra Alta, where he attended the Preston County Institute.

We are delighted to learn that Miss Ida Harvey has consented to take charge of our school for the coming year. Miss Harvey is no experiment with us. She taught here two years ago, and was greatly liked by all.

W. T. Steyer spent Friday and Saturday in Oakland and Deer Park.

Mr. Ed. Tucker was in town again last week.

Mr. E. A. Alderton, of Gormania, W. Va., was seen on our streets two or three times last week.

Mrs. J. D. Harvey and daughter, Miss Artie, of Shook Shop school house, spent Sunday in the community visiting some of our sick.

Prof. W. T. Haught, Dean of Wesleyan College at Buckhannon, W. Va., spent Monday evening and part of Tuesday in town in the interest of his college.

Geo. Farris, our hustling teamster, had a fine draft animal crippled one day last week.

John and James, the two little sons of Supt. Melvin have been suffering with scarlet fever for the last ten days, but are improving now.

Mrs. Isaac I. Thompson was the guest of Miss Emma Steyer one day last week.

Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Newell, of Blaine, W. Va., were visting in the community recently.

McHENRY.

The weather at this time is most beautiful, yet the atmosphere is a little cool. Old Jack Frost paid us a visit Saturday night.

Mr. and Mrs. William McLean spent last Sunday with Mr. McLean's parents.

Mr. Jonas Glotfelty and daughter, Cora, made a flying trip to Oakland last Friday.

Mr. Claude Lowdermilk attended Epworth League at Hoyes Sunday evening.

Mr. Asa Glotfelty made a flying trip to Oakland one day last week.

Misses Ruth and May Delawder returned to Oakland last Friday and expect to leave there soon for their home in Washington.

Mr. Geo. Glotfelty and family spent last Sunday at the home of Alvin Friend at Sang Run.

Misses Sarah Glotfelty and Sarah Savage spent last Sunday at the home of Jonas Glotfelty.

Miss Mary Hinebaugh has returned home after spending several weeks with Miss Ethel Glotfelty.

The old automobile of Sang Run has been calling at T. C. Hinebaugh's quite frequently.

Mr. C. W. Fraker is the champion snake killer of McHenry.

The Red Brush Lumber Co. is doing a rushing business at this time.

Misses Ruth and May Delawder and Anna Lowdermilk spent last Thursday at the home of Mrs. M. Glotfelty.

Rev. H. E. Friend delivered an excellent sermon at this place last Sunday.

Quite a number of our young people were calling at the home of Mr. N. F. Pysell last Sunday.

The hack from Rocky Point made a flying trip to Accident last Sunday.

McHenry Lokels.

The wether in this lokality is onusually thretnin' for this time o' year.

Mrs. Hattie Glotfelty stopt in at Mr. Lem Savage's out o' the rain one day las' weak.

Mr. Pete Spiker wus makin' his weekly call at Mr. George Glotfelty's las' Monday.

Two ottomobeles past thru town one day last week but Mr. Paul Hoye's wus not one o' them.

Somethin has struck the sheep in this naborhood. They are dyin' by the thousand.

Miss Sara Savage wus a plesant caller on Miss Anna Lowdermilk one day.

Miss Anna Lowdermilk an' sister made a flyin' trip to Sang Run one day las' week—we gess they flew as they drove a high sperited animal.

T. C. Hinebaugh walked out the other day to look at his korn.

Now that we are not needin' rain in particlar, we are havin' quite a spel of it.

T. C. Hinebaugh is sufferin' so with pneuralgy in his face that it is more twisted than when he looks nacherel.

Mr. George Glotfelty wus a plesant caller at Mad Friend's las' week.

Mr. Loraditch from Oakland past thru town but only tuched the high places.

Miss Ruth an' May Delawder who have ben visitin' frends in this naborhood returned to the metropolis Friday a. m.

News is so skerce in this lokality. I gess every body is buzy with there own affairs that they ain't doin' much wurth menshioning for which let us not be ongratful.

PANAMA CANAL TO COST $375,201,000

Engineers Will Have To Use Every Dollar Available on Construction.

It will require every dollar to be realized from the sale of bonds and authorized by appropriations by Congress to complete the Panama canal, according to the estimates which have been made by the Isthmian Canal Commission. The latest estimate of the total cost of the canal made by the Commission is $375,201,000.

Sums now and hereafter available will provide $375,200,900 for construction work, showing that the engineers will be sailing pretty close to the wind as the canal nears completion.

The tariff act, which was approved by the President on August 5, authorizes a bond issue of $290,569,000, in addition to the $84,631,900 heretofore issued for canal construction. The urgent deficiency act, approved the same day, authorizes the President to enter into such contracts, not exceeding the amount of the bond issue authorized, as may be necessary to complete the canal and harbors.

Expenditures made on the isthmus have been the subject of considerable criticism in Congress. The Canal Commission, therefore, furnishes some figures which make clear the financial standing of the work in progress. The act of June 2, 1902, authorizing the construction of an isthmian canal provided for the issuance of $130,000,000 worth of bonds, and also limited the amount that could be appropriated for the Panama canal to $135,000,000, in addition to $10,000,000 for preparatory work, $40,000,000 for the property of the New Panama Canal Company and a sum to be agreed upon to be paid to the Republic of Colombia.

Under this authority there has been expended for canal work up to May 31, 1909, $104,177,884.86, and in addition the $40,000,000 had been paid to the New Panama Canal Company and $10,000,000 to the Republic of Panama—a total of $154,177,884.86. The appropriations available up to June 30, 1909, amounted to $174,332,468.58, and the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year is $33,658,000. Expenditures for canal work have been paid from bonds aggregating $84,631,900 and money advanced from the miscellaneous funds of the Treasury.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1909. NUMBER 27

GARRETT COUNTY DEMOCRATS ARE UP IN THE AIR

Curious Political Situation in Garrett County.

Yesterday's Baltimore American says in a telegram from Oakland:

Since the nomination of the Republican ticket in this county several weeks ago, politics have been quiet. However, the situation has been very much enlivened since the Democrats published their primary call in the local paper last week. The committee adopted the convention plan for nominating the ticket. The primary is called for September 13 to elect five delegates from each of the 14 districts, to meet in convention at Oakland on September 15 to nominate the ticket. The call was signed by two members of the state central committee, differing from the previous call when they elected delegates to the state convention, which was signed by the chairman only.

At the present time the Democratic committee of this county consists of but two members, the third not having yet been appointed. The failure to make this appointment by Chairman Vandiver, of the state committee, has greatly intensified the existing bitterness between the Browning and Hamill factions. The party leaders here have been expecting daily the announcement from Baltimore of the name of the third member of their committee. Petitions have been circulated, numerously signed and forwarded to Chairman Vandiver in Baltimore by the different factions, each favoring their choice for this vacancy in the committee.

The Hamill faction elected their delegates by a safe majority, but this delegation was not allowed to name the members of the state central committee when it met at the state convention in Baltimore, which has heretofore been the policy of the party.

G. Semmes Hamill, Jr., leader of the Hamill faction, who was recently appointed a member of the state central committee by the state convention, accompanied by his law partner, Tott Matthews, spent several days last week visiting the different districts of the county endeavoring to get his Democratic friends to file their application as candidates for delegates from their respective districts to the convention. They returned from their trip over the county Saturday and it is rumored that they failed to get a single applicant in any of the 14 districts of the county to consent to the use of his name as a candidate for delegate to the county convention, and as Monday, August 30, was the last day under the Primary Election Law to file their application, it is openly stated that a Democratic ticket will not be nominated according to the primary call.

It was believed by many from the beginning that this would be the result, as the two factions are so wide apart that it is impossible for them to agree upon the personnel of a ticket, platform, or what should be their policy toward the Straus disfranchising amendment. There is great opposition to the amendment among many of the Democrats of this country. Since it seems impossible to nominate a ticket in the regular order, it is now rumored they endeavor to place a Democratic ticket in the field by petition, and give it the name of the "People's," "Citizen's" "Fusion" ticket. Up to this time, they have not agreed upon a name for the regular Democratic ticket, and as it cannot go on the official ballot under that name, the query here is: What will its name be?

The names of the candidates most frequently mentioned by the different factions for this ticket are Tom Johnson, of District 9, for Senator, and Clarence V. Guard, of District 2, for sheriff. Since about all the prominent Democrats have refused to become candidates on this ticket, an effort is now being made to induce some Republicans to allow their names to be used, but thus far without success.

Many of the Democrats declare that there is no hope of the two factions uniting upon a ticket, and further, that a large number of the voters of their party who have never been known to scratch a ticket openly declare they will support the nominees of the Republican party. G. S. Hamill, Jr., publicly declares that he is very ambitious to be the leader of his party in this county, but the regulars, who have control of the school board and other state offices, are as equally determined that he shall not lead on account of his bitter personal and political attacks upon the old organization. At the same time, they claim that he is responsible for the disruption of the Democratic party in this county.

Mr. D. Lindley Sloan Nominated for Judge

By the Republicans at Hagerstown Tuesday Afternoon Amid Much Enthusiasm.

Mr. D. Lindley Sloan of the Cumberland bar was Tuesday afternoon nominated for the office of chief judge by the Republican convention of the Fourth Judicial circuit of Maryland held in the court room at Hagerstown. Mr. Sloan received the votes of Allegany and Garrett counties, a total of nine to the six votes of Washington county, cast for Charles D. Wagaman. The nomination of Mr. Sloan was heartily applauded and was made unanimous. Nearly 100 enthusiastic friends of Mr. Sloan from Allegany county attended the convention.

Mr. Benjamin H. Sinecll, editor of the Republican and a delegate from Garrett county, was chairman of the convention and William U. Roulette of Washington county, was secretary. The committee on credentials, resolutions and permanent organizations was composed of Thompson A. Brown, the Republican nominee for state senator in Washington county; David A. Robb, Allegany county, and William A. Smith, Garrett county.

MR. D. LINDLEY SLOAN.

The resolutions, reported by Mr. Thompson A. Brown, were as follows:

"The Republican party of the Fourth Judicial Circuit in convention assembled, fully recognizes its obligation to the people of the circuit in the nomination of the Republican candidate for chief judge.

"In the nature of things, under a popular government, in is wise and necessary that political parties shall nominate candidates for office, even though the duties of office are of a non-political character. In this respect the election of Judicial candidates differs little from any other state or county office. The successful candidate, upon his election, becomes the servant of the whole people, and regardless of his office, whether judicial or ministerial, must do his whole duty. In the performance of his duties one must measures up to the requirements of his position; his candidacy promises and his oath requires it.

"When one becomes a party's candidate, whether for judge or any other office, he represents the principles of his party, and if he be a Democratic candidate, he stands opposed to the principles of Republicanism, and against its success.

"This convention accepts the challenge of the recent Democratic convention's declaration for a non-partisan judiciary, and answers that the people of Maryland are entitled to a bi-partisan Court of Appeals. The surest way to have non-partisanship in the Court of Appeals is to, as nearly as possible, equally divided between the two dominant parties in the state, the members of that court. Non-partisan does not mean that the Maryland Court of Appeals shall forever be composed of partisan Democrats.

"The Democratic party is not sincere in its advocacy of a non-partisan Judiciary, and is not honest in its contention. The political rights of the people of Maryland are not best protected by a one party Appellate Court, and the Republicans of Maryland demand representation in the highest court of the state, commensurate with their importance, power and numbers.

"The Republicans of this circuit do not concede that the candidate of the Democratic party is the superior, of either of the men who are candidates for nomination before this convention. He is a Democrat whose political views are diametrically opposed to the vast majority of the voters of this Judicial Circuit. His party cannot honestly, and in good faith ask Republicans to desert their party with a non-partisan cry, and at the same time make an appeal to Democrats to support their candidate for party reasons.

"This convention will have presented to it the names of lawyers who are the peers, mentally and morally, of any man occupying the Judicial office in the state of Maryland; the best years of their lives are before them; they can serve out the full term for which they are candidates, and will not be retired at an age which the constitution of the state of Maryland has fixed as the limit of a judge's usefulness on the bench. Furthermore the nominee of this convention will be a Republican who will be elected in November, and will give to the Court of Appeals of Maryland a more non-partisan character than it now possesses.

"It is time for the Republican party of the Fourth Judicial Circuit to come into its own, and this convention commends its nominee to the people of this circuit with the utmost confidence in his election."

The name of Mr. Wagaman was first put in nomination by Mr. A. C. Strite in a speech that called forth enthusiastic applause. The court hall was packed with friends of Mr. Wagaman who never failed to make a demonstration in behalf of their favorite.

Mr. David A. Robb, state's attorney for Allegany county, put in nomination Mr. D. Lindley Sloan in a speech that was most telling. Mr. Robb riddled the Democratic contention of a non-partisan judiciary, pointing out that in this circuit Democrats were appointed by the Governor in the places of Judges Edward Stake and David W. Sloan, Republicans, when they were called by death.

He was enthusiastic in describing the capabilities of Mr. Sloan, who was learned in the law, a possesser of sound judgment and of common sense, the latter not being the least of what is needed in the make-up of a judge. Mr. Robb spoke with much force and such conviction that even the friends of Mr. Wagaman could not refrain from joining in the applause.

Mr. Julius C. Renninger, of Oakland, state's attorney of Garrett county, seconded the nomination of Mr. Sloan following Alex. Armstrong, state's attorney for Washington county, who seconded the nomination of Mr. Wagaman. Mr. Renninger seconding the nomination of Mr. Sloan indicated at once that Garrett county was for the man who was born and reared in Allegany county, the mother of Garrett county and on the border of the latter. As soon as this was done it was known that Mr. Sloan was the nominee and the spectators began to leave the hall. Mr. Lloyd L. Shaffer seconded Mr. Sloan's nomination on behalf of Allegany county.

It had not been known how Garrett county would vote and up to the time Mr. Renninger seconded Mr. Sloan's nomination all seemed to be in the dark as to the outcome.

It had been understood that the convention would be called to order at noon but when the Allegany county delegation arrived announcement was made that the convention would not assemble till 1:30 p. m. In the meantime the Wagaman supporters got after the three delegates from Garrett county and they never received such attention in their lives.

The convention was called to order by Capt. L. H. Kuhn of Hancock, a member of the state central committee for Washington county. It was generally felt that the chief judge of the fourth judicial circuit should be a Republican and Mr. Sloan's nomination was received most gratifyingly here. It was said on all sides that he will receive most substantial support in Washington county and that he would be elected beyond doubt.

The delegates to the convention were: Garrett county, Benj. H. Sinecll, Julius C. Renninger and Wm. A. Smith; Allegany county, James Corfield, James S. Hayden, Lloyd Shaffer, Samuel Tibby, David A. Robb and George E. Williams.

From Washington county was recognized a mass delegation present.

The County Treasurership.

To the Editor of the Republican:

After indulging in a general review of the Republican ticket, in last week's issue of THE REPUBLICAN, it is our purpose this week to call especial attention to the candidate on that ticket for the County Treasurership, Mr. Robert L. Fries, of Sang Run.

Since the individual purse has come to be regarded as the vital centre of individual economy, so also the national, state and county treasury is rightly regarded as a most important department of general government, and it is therefore wise that the people look well to the honor and individual integrity of the men in whose hands the management of the treasury department is placed. Knowing Mr. Fries to be filled with an earnest desire and firm determination to discharge the duties of the office to which he seeks election, and believing him to possess all the virtues and qualifications of a reliable, prompt and efficient treasurer, we heartily endorse the action of the Convention in placing so strong a candidate before the people and earnestly commend him to the voters of the county, whose support of the entire ticket, and especially the candidate above referred to, will place at the head of our local government officials of ability and sterling worth. SENATOR BLAIR LEE OF MONTGOMERY ON ROADS

Scores Engineer Crosby And Present Building Methods.

At Clarksville, Md., declaring that the present road-building methods of Road Engineer Crosby and the Maryland Good Road Commission were extravagent and unlikely to produce the results expected State Senator Blair Lee, of Montgomery county, made an address last Thursday in which he made suggestions to the farmers gathered at the annual picnic of St. Louis' Catholic Church, held in the grove surrounding the old church building.

Mr. Lee not only declared that the roads being built under the Shoemaker act are incapable of withstanding the heavy hauling done in the hill counties, but said that the road engineer seemed unwilling to accept the suggestion of those who consider themselves in good position to judge results. He earnestly advocated the use of local stones in the building of the the thoroughfare in Howard and Montgomery counties and said just as good material could be procured for use in place of the limestone now used. His address was received vociferous applause.

Senator Lee was doubly introduced to the crowd, which numbered 3,000 and 4,000 persons. First Col. William S. Powell, strikingly clothed in an East Indian costume, consisting of white duck coat and trousers and pith helmet, made a glowing speech in appreciation of Mr. Lee.

"He is a State Senator now, and being a candidate for re-election he will again be a Senator and in the future he will be the Governor of the State," the Colonel said to the cheers of the people.

Mr. Edward M. Hammond, Democratic candidate for the Legislature from the Second Legislative district, then introduced the Senator by saying that the good roads movement was inaugurated in Congress in 1830 by Henry Clay, but that Senator Lee was among the first to see the chance for Maryland.

In beginning his address Mr. Lee said that the railroad or trust magnates who tried to increase the cost of transportation on the products of the farmers were no better than highwayman who infested the road of old England, and he compared them to Robin Hood in his palmiest days.

"There is a sentiment awakening in both parties," he said, "and a wave of knowledge concerning the public affairs has been sweeping over the community through the newspapers."

Senator Lee then said that the newspapers, as a channel of public knowledge, should be entirely open, but criticised them for printing only "one-tenth of what they know."

Getting down to the base of his subject, he said that it was important that the good roads provided for under the last loan should be built cheaply and at the same time substantially so that the money could go as far as possible. He said that in each of the counties of Howard and Montgomery there should be at least 36 miles of improvement, but that under the present system of road-building he doubted if that mileage of good roads would be obtained.

"We have in these counties stone eminently fitted for use on roads, but no attention is paid to it. We have, in addition to the flint a rock called trappe rock, which has long been recognized as perfect for road construction, and we have also niggerhead stone, which has unequaled wearing and cementing qualities. Yet Mr. Crosby has been using soft limestone and refusing to use the stone over which the roads he is going to build will pass.

"If, under our form of government, we are going to let a lot of people who are half crank and half professional and who won't let us use our good local stone, then we're softheaded. If we don't take an interest in this important question we do not deserve good roads.

"On two miles of roads built in our county by Mr. Crosby we have had to pay $5,000 a mile in repairs since the road was laid three years ago. On another road we had to pay $1,200 a mile for they show no enduring capacity. Our old pikes loom up as magnificent beside these flimsy substitutes. We have repaired two-thirds what were built."

Grand Chancellor to Visit.

Notices have been mailed to the membership of Garrett Lodge Knights of Pythias requesting a full attendance at the regular session of the lodge to be held Friday night at which time the Grand Chancellor, accompanied by other officers of the grand lodge will make an official visit to the local organization. All members are requested to be in attendance.

WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnificent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience; America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,000.00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and believe that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator is still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

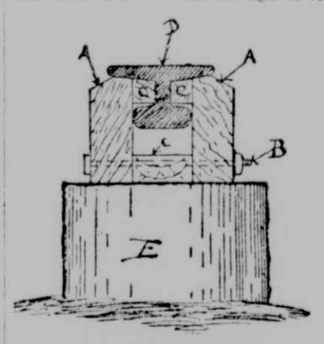
PALATABLE FODDER CORN.

Prof Thomas Shaw Urges Proper Care of This Feed.

The method of handling this product differs in various localities. The common method of harvesting puts it into shocks of moderate size as soon as cut, and then into stacks when the weather gets cool. Some growers adopt the following plan: They harvest in the usual way. The corn is put up in small shocks. It is then put into larger shocks, say two weeks later. This plan is followed by J. J. Furlong of Austin, Minn., who won first prize on his farm in the Hill contest. The object is to preserve the brightness in the corn and to prevent it from weathering unduly. Mr. Furlong puts four shocks into one. Then as soon as the weather becomes cool, he puts the shocks into stacks with a diameter of about 15 feet. In this way the fodder is well protected from the weather, so that when it is fed it is brighter, sweeter and more nutritious than if fed from the shocks.



This system has the further advantage in areas with a heavy winter snowfall. It gets the corn where it is safe from injury from snow or sleet before these storms come. The objection may be raised that this means extra work. It does, but it means extra value in the fodder also, and extra value that will usually far outweigh the extra labor incurred.

The method of stacking such corn is greatly influenced by the character of the climate. Where winter comes early, the corn cannot in all instances be put into stacks wider than one length of sheaves. The tops and butts are reversed alternately to keep the long stack level. In other instances, where the corn is drier, two lengths of sheaves are admissible, overlapping at the tops, and in yet others wide, oblong or round stacks may be built without endangering the safety of the corn. Good corn fodder, especially if not coarse, is one of the best and most economical of fodders. Poor corn fodder is of but little account.

HOME-MADE ANVIL.

Serviceable Device Easily Made Out of Piece of Old Rail.

The anvil shown in the illustration is inexpensive, and easy of construction. As shown in the cut, D is a piece of old R. R. rail, which may be from two to four or more feet in length. The rail is turned bottom side up as shown; A A are two pieces of timber, two to four inches thick, and six or eight inches wide, the size of the three pieces of timber marked C C C will depend on the size of the rail, but should be as heavy as possible. The two pieces A A are shaped as shown, and brought up close to the top or rounding side of the iron, several bolts are now cut through A A and C as shown at B, as many as size of anvil will permit. If the end piece of the rail, with holes for the fish plates can be secured put bolts through at the top, if not, simply nail the two top pieces C C to A A. When finished, set anvil on the end of a large cut from an oak tree, as shown at E or on anything that is solid. The anvil with a few simple tools will enable the farmer to do many odd jobs on the farm and will often save a trip to town. R. R. iron may be obtained from almost any section foreman and wood is usually at hand.

Inverted Rail as Anvil.

ALL AROUND THE FARM.

The garden is seldom enriched as much as it should be to get the best results from it.

Rotation of crops is destructive to predatory insects.

Gentleness in cows is very desirable and should be bred for.

The nervous cow is not at home on the ordinary American farm.

A well of pure water is necessary for the success of the dairy farm.

The 200-egg-a-year hen is a reality, but not many of them are found in a flock. Ten dozen eggs a year for a hen is a good yield, and at that she will pay 100 per cent. dividends.

A high up reputation has been made with the low-down wagon. Give it a respectful hearing as to its merits.

High Yielding Oats.

Within the past 19 years 295 varieties of oats have been tested at the Ontario Agricultural college and 59 varieties have been compared in each of the past five years. Among these Yellow Russian, Vick American Banner and New Zealand ranked first in grain production, with respectively 102 bushels, 101.9 bushels and 99.4 bushels per acre as an average for five years. Halless, the lowest ranking variety, yielded 56.2 bushels and 31 varieties of the 59 yielded over 90 bushels per acre. Varieties possessing the stiffest straw in 1907, were Liberty, Daubeney, Banner, Kherson, Early Champion and Siberian.

Under the Apple Tree

By JANE LUDLUM LEE.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

"Come along, Patsy; let's away from this piazza crowd and hie ourselves to the hills," suggested Belinda Bowers stooping close to the little terrier snuggling against her freshly laundered frock.

Patsy wagged his abbreviated tail and set his ears up very straight in reply.

"The piazza crowd," according to Belinda's light, was the aggregation of somewhat colorless and uncertainly aged summer boarders, whose fingers could barely keep pace with their tongues as they embroidered and talked on the wide veranda of the Cedarvale inn.

Belinda and Patsy strolled down the village street and stopped in front of the dilapidated postoffice for mail. The gray haired postmaster peered through the small opening, his eyes shining above the gold rims of his glasses.

"COME HERE THIS MINUTE, YOUNG MAN," SHE CALLED IN A STERN VOICE.

"There's a letter here for 'B. Bowers.' Be that you?"

"Yes, Miss B. Bowers," affirmed Belinda.

"Well, there ain't no 'Miss' on it, but reckon it's yours, all right," and he handed her the letter.

Belinda was too happy day dreaming to open the uninteresting looking legal envelope. It might be a bill, so she thrust it between the leaves of her magazine. When she and Patsy reached a shady apple orchard, surrounded by a low stone wall, Belinda settled herself comfortably and opened the missive.

"Dear B.," it ran, "hope this finds you wide awake and that you've discovered something doing in Cedarvale. I understand there's nothing doing in Cedarville. I understand there's nothing in the line of females up there under sixty, except one queen, named Belinda Bowers. I met her last winter at Mrs. Alston's. Stop painting fool pictures and see if you can't get next to her royal highness. Ta, ta.

"BUZZ."

Belinda's eyes were beaming with the humor of the mistake. She looked again at the envelope. It certainly bore her name, yet the letter was evidently meant for other eyes. Who was "Buzz?"

"Patsy, old doggie," said Belinda as she patted him affectionately on the head. "There's something in Cedarvale at last, and methinks we're it."

Patsy barked with delight at the sudden turn of affairs. Then something on the other side of the wall attracted his attention, and he bounded over, barking incessantly. Belinda followed him with her glance and discovered that an artist was sketching about fifty feet away. The dog paid no attention to her recalling whistle, and she followed him.

"Come here this minute, young man," she called in a stern voice.

The artist rose.

"At your service," he murmured as he bowed before her.

"I was calling the dog," explained Belinda, much embarrassed.

"I realize that," parried the man, "but since the dog refuses I thought I might do."

Inwardly Belinda told herself that decidedly he would do, but for answer she gave him an irresistible laugh.

"Won't you sit down under the shade of my apple tree, Miss Bowers?" suggested the man, suddenly turning host.

Belinda made herself comfortable, and the man dropped down beside her.

"How did you know that I was Miss Bowers?" inquired Belinda finally.

"How did I know?" echoed her companion. "Cedarvale is a small place, and when a beautiful girl lands in our midst the whole town talks of nothing else." He laughed aloud at the thought, and then, with more seriousness, he added, "May I go on?"

Belinda was interested and gave her consent.

"Well, to be frank with you, I saw you the night you and your mother arrived, and I've been hankering for an introduction ever since. Why, I've even hung about dark lanes hoping to rescue you. I've gone to dances where I've been the only man present in hopes that some of the antediluvians might introduce me. But all efforts were futile until this disobedient pup has made me his everlasting debtor."

"In case Patsy wants to send in a bill for services rendered," coyly demanded Belinda, "what's the debtor's name?"

"My name's Hazzard — Bellington Forbes Hazzard. Never heard of me, did you?"

"Well, I once read a short article about you," acknowledged Belinda, her eyes snapping with delight. "That's an awfully long name of yours, though," she continued. "What do your friends call you when they are in a hurry?"

"Just 'B.,'" he informed her, and Belinda actually giggled.

Two hours later the trio were back on the hotel piazza, and Belinda had not mentioned the letter. The next day and every day thereafter found the three companions taking long walks, and Belinda realized that she was doing very little reading, while Hazzard left his canvas in a most unfinished condition.

The season at Cedarvale was almost at an end, and the trees in the orchard were laden with gorgeous red fruit. Patsy was chasing birds, while Belinda was curled up at the foot of a favorite tree, and Hazzard was beside her. This morning there seemed to be long, unaccountable pauses in the conversation, and for some reason Belinda felt a premonition of what was forthcoming.

"Did you ever read what people thought about you?" asked Belinda.

"Yes, I read a short article about myself once written by one of my dearest friends, Buzz Murray," he acknowledged. "But I must say in defense of my friend that it was never intended for my eyes."

"Do you mean Mr. B. Z. Murray—Mrs. Alston's friend?" inquired Belinda.

"That's the man. We nicknamed him Buzz at college." Then, fumbling in his pockets, Hazzard produced a well worn letter. "Here's the article," he announced as he handed her an envelope addressed to himself.

Belinda read aloud:

My Dear Miss Bowers—I hear you are in Cedarville and I wish you would send a card to my old friend Hazzard. His people have a cottage there. He's the dearest old slob in the world. There is only one thing against him—insanity has developed in him, taking the form of painting, but it is a harmless type. His other endearing qualities will quite outweigh this, however, and I fancy you two would find each other most congenial. Sincerely yours, B. Z. MURRAY.

"But this letter was intended for me," cried Belinda. "Why didn't you give it to me?"

"For the same reason that you did not return the one intended for me," announced Hazzard. "Of course, Buzz got his envelopes mixed, but I for one am willing to forgive him."

"But"—

"And I want you to forgive him, too, Belinda," interrupted Hazzard as he looked long into her eyes. "These past few weeks have been heaven on earth to me, and—and may I hope—just a little hope—that you, too, have been happy?"

Patsy rushed around the tree, barking and dancing on his tiny feet.

"At least Patsy is happy," parried Belinda.

Bellington picked the terrier up in his arms and held him tightly for a moment. But Patsy saw a stray cat and was anxious to be off again.

"What did my letter say of you?" asked Hazzard.

"Oh, some awfully silly things," answered Belinda.

"Well, may I hope, Belinda—here under the old apple tree that has lent us its friendly shade all these happy weeks—may I have my answer here and now?"

"Answer to what?" she almost whispered.

"Will you be my wife, Belinda?" he murmured as he drew her closely to him. And, lingering in his embrace, she gave her answer.

Litigious South Africans.

The Diamond Fields Advertiser, referring to the litigious nature of the natives of South Africa, gives the following as an instance: "A native had fought and lost an action in the magistrate's court in one of the small towns in Griqualand East, the articles in dispute being a slate and an alphabetical primer of the total value of sixpence. He, immediately after the judgment was given against him, started on a journey on foot to the chief town, about thirty miles distant, in order to instruct an attorney there to appeal from the judgment given. The attorney laughed at the man and told him he should desist, as he would only be wasting his money over a trivial matter, but he tendered the costs of the appeal to the attorney and insisted; otherwise he would consult another lawyer. After a long consultation and endeavor to advise his client to act as was thought best the attorney complied with the native's wishes. The native won his appeal."

Working the Public.

The subway express stopped at Seventy-second street. Passengers got off and on. Just as the guard on one car rang the bell to go ahead a gray haired woman neatly dressed rushed to the door, crying: "Let me off! Let me off! She's got my pocketbook!" The guard refused to open the door, as the train was already pulling out of the station. A few more words and she ended by saying, "Well, you will have to lend me a nickel car fare to get home," but neither this guard nor his companions in the cars ahead or behind had the money.

A gentleman who had observed all offered the lady 10 cents, which she accepted, seemingly reluctantly. At Fourteenth street she got off. The guard shook his head knowingly and when some one remarked on the happening said: "She couldn't fool me. I know her of old. That's a game of hers, and she gets many a nickel by that trick."—New York Sun.

NEW ERA FOR BOWSER

Works Complete Change In Him For Twenty-four Hours.

THEN HE HAS A RELAPSE.

Cook Suspicious All Along — There Are No Kicks For a Whole Day, and He Takes Wifey to the Theater. Supper Afterward.

[Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.]

Ninety-nine times out of a hundred Mr. Bowser follows a regular programme when called to get up in the morning. He hunts for his day shirt; he hunts for his socks; he hunts for his collar and tie. He finds one of his shoes in the upper hall and the other under the dresser, and his watch is as apt to be found under the bed as elsewhere. Mrs. Bowser expects it and goes through with it and looks for her reward beyond the skies.

The other morning, to her unbounded surprise, there were no kicks. Mr. Bowser even forgot to throw out a hint about wives getting up in the night to rob their husbands of small change. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred he kicks at breakfast, but on this morning he actually praised the chops and coffee. The cook overheard him, but instead of flushing with pleasure she looked at Mrs. Bowser and shook her head in a solemn way. She afterward explained her action by saying:

"WHY, SARAH, HOW CAN YOU THINK SO BADLY OF MY HUSBAND?"

"A woman may change her mind a dozen times a day and it's all right, but whenever a man changes then look out. When a man is too good he's more dangerous than when he's too bad. I'm predicting that something awful will happen in this house within the next two days."

Mr. Bowser generally jams his hat on his head after breakfast and starts for the car with a "S'long!" to Mrs. Bowser, and on the way up to the corner he wonders how he can make it hot for the conductor. On this occasion, however, he hung around for awhile and tickled Mrs. Bowser under the chin and stooped to pet the cat. Before he had reached the corner he had made up his mind that street car conductors were human beings and should have words of sympathy and encouragement now and then. On the way over to the office a fat woman stepped on his foot, and he raised his hand and smiled at her. She was so taken with his action that she returned and stepped on the other. The conductor gazed into his beaming face and then returned only 15 cents out of a quarter, but there was no kick.

Four times that day Mrs. Bowser was called up on the telephone to find Mr. Bowser at the other end. He hadn't much to say either time. He just asked after her health and added that he never expected to see the day when he should regret falling in love with and marrying her. In his last message he suggested that the cat be treated with the greatest urbanity and that the cook's wages be raised $3 per month. Mrs. Bowser was puzzling over this last when the cook came to her, with a stiletto in her hand, and, passing it over, said:

"Be prepared. When he comes home tonight, if he is not his old self again, then let him know that you are armed to the teeth and will die in the last ditch."

Prepared For the Worst.

"Why, Sarah, how can you think so badly of my husband?" was asked.

"It would be the same with any man. If he's a kicker he's no right to be oily and sweet and throw folks off their guard. I shall sleep this night with the family ax under my pillow."

Mr. Bowser came home with a forty candle power smile on his phiz and greeted Mrs. Bowser with a kiss. A politician on the car and called his candidate a robber, but he had only laughed at the idea. A cross eyed passenger had taken him for some one else and dunned him for $2 borrowed money, but the incident had only provoked a smile. At the table he complimented the dinner as a whole. He said it was a regular banquet. He said the cook ought to be working in the White House at a hundred dollars a month. He said that if he could always be sure of having such a home and such a dinner he would give up trying to go to heaven. He said that he would rather come home than go to a cabinet dinner. He said that on numerous occasions he had sought to dabble his hands in the lifeblood of the old "yaller" cat, but never without his conscience pricking him afterward, and he had fully and firmly decided never again to seek to harm a hair of her body.

It was one of the most entertaining dinners for months and months, and, although the cook gave Mrs. Bowser a glance of warning every time she brought in a new dish, there was no cloud on the horizon. The greatest surprise of all came when the meal had been finished. Mr. Bowser pulled a couple of theater tickets from his pocket and announced that he had ordered a carriage to convey them to and fro.

"But the expense!" gasped Mrs. Bowser.

"Hang the expense! Nothing is too good for my little wife."

While Mrs. Bowser was dressing and fluttering about the cook brought the stiletto again. It had been brightened up and a sharper point put to it.

"Take it and stab him to the heart the moment he grabs you by the throat," she whispered. "I have five sisters and four cousins, all married women, and they go armed most of the time."

"But you are silly, Sarah."

"I'm just prudent, ma'am. I'll leave it to any policeman on earth if Mr. Bowser is not a suspicious character the way he has acted today and if it isn't for you to be on your guard against him. How easy to throttle you in the carriage and throw your body into the street to be run over by the cars! Let me speak to him and tell him that unless he brings you safe home I'll have the hounds of justice pursue him for the rest of his life."

But Mrs. Bowser decided to trust herself to the situation. It was a good play, and the theater was jammed. People elbowed Mr. Bowser, and he even begged their pardon for it. They stepped on his toes, banged him around and climbed over him, but he was a ray of sunshine in a rainy April day. Mrs. Bowser fairly longed for him to kick, but he wouldn't. He went right at it to enjoy the play, and, although it was a tragedy, he laughed about once in two minutes all through it. People around him scowled and hissed and said that any man who would laugh at a death scene ought to be thrown out of the house by the neck, but nothing that could be said riled him. He just went right on laughing and saying that it was the funniest play he had seen for forty years.

When the finish came Mrs. Bowser expected to be taken right home, but there was another surprise in store for her. She was taken away to a restaurant, and Mr. Bowser ordered lobster and champagne and other things regardless of expense. He said he was a happy man. He said that life was worth living. He said they would go to the theater every night in the week thereafter and he would order a thousand lobsters and a barrel of champagne sent up to the house next day. When the supper was ended and Mr. Bowser was looking for the carriage Mrs. Bowser had the great good fortune to run across their family doctor, who was also in the place for a bite to eat.

"Oh, I'm so glad!" she exclaimed as they shook hands.

"It's about Mr. Bowser?" he queried.

"Yes. Doctor, do you know"—

Struck a New Era.

"I know all about it. I saw him on the car when he went home, and I was only four seats back of you in the theater tonight."

"You saw him laughing?"

"I did."

"And he wouldn't kick at anything!"

"I took notice."

"And this splendid dinner—what do you make of it?"

"You need not be at all alarmed. Mr. Bowser has simply struck a new era. All husbands do now and then."

"But how long is it going to last? I confess that I'm almost afraid of him."

"These eras sometimes last fifteen minutes and sometimes twenty-four hours. Knowing Mr. Bowser as I do, I should say that he'll be the same old Bowser when he wakes up tomorrow morning."

And the doctor was right. Mrs. Bowser overslept herself by a quarter of an hour, and what woke her up was Mr. Bowser saying as he hunted around the room for a missing sock:

"By thunder, woman, you got up in the night and threw that sock out of the window just to spite me! The time has come when you and I have got to have a long talk together, and if it lands you in your mother's home without alimony don't you blame me for it!" M. QUAD.

AREA OF U. S.

Now Has 3,743,344 Square Miles Exclusive of Alaska.

The geological survey of the United States has taken advantage of the fact that boundaries of the United States have all been finally fixed and the land and water area of each state charted, to issue two bulletins, one of which deals exclusively with the history of all boundary lines, not only of the nation but the individual states, and the other with the area of the country. Except for possible errors in the misinterpretation of the coast line there is little doubt that the measurements of the country as a whole are now nearer accurate than ever before. The total area of the United States is given as 3,743,344 miles, exclusive of Alaska, the canal zone and the island possessions.

One of the most interesting historical descriptions in the bulletin on boundaries is that describing the fixing of Mason and Dixon's line. The passage is as follows:

"According to the original grants of Pennsylvania and Maryland the boundary between them was to be the fortieth degree of north latitude. This line being found to pass north of Philadelphia and to exclude Pennsylvania from Delaware bay, negogiations ensued between the proprieters to rectify this geographical blunder, and for nearly a century the matter remained unsettled.

"In 1760 commissioners and surveyors were appointed, who spent three years is measuring the base line and the tangent line between Maryland and Deleware. The proprietors then, wearied with the delay, sent over from England two famous mathemeticians, Charles Dixon and Jeremiah Mason, who verified the work of their predecessors and ran the line west between Pennsylvania and Maryland, since known as 'Mason and Dixon's line.'

"Mason and Dixon fixed the latitude of this line at 39 degrees 43 minutes 18 seconds. A re-survey in 1850 by Col. Graham determined it to be 39 degrees 43 minutes 26.3 seconds.

"Mason and Dixon began their work in 1763 and ware stopped by Indians in 1767, having run the line about 244 miles west of the Delaware, not quite finishing their work. They put up milestones all along said line, every fifth one being marked with the arms of the respective proprietors.

"In consequence of the accidental removal of the stone at the northeast corner of Maryland, commissioners were appointed in 1850 by Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland, to revise the former survey, which was done by Lieut. Col. Graham of the United States topographical engineers. The result confirmed the work of Mason and Dixon and Maryland gained by the re-survey a little less than two acres.

THE EDITOR ANALYZED.

Sort of an X-Ray Revelation by the Astute and Discriminating Office Boy.

"Editor—One who edits a book, journal or newspaper."—Webster.

If Webster had ever worked for an Editor he could never define him without using cuss words. The editor is allmost human sometimes but most of the time he is a quer duck. He has a has a nose for news like a duck. He has one big ear which he lends to publick opineon and scandal. The other small one he lends to his crediters. The Editor allways smoks a corncob pipe on ackount of its ekonomy and besides it holes more dope for ideas. The Editor never has much hare. He rubs most of it off wile writing edictorials on the tariff question. When the Editor loses his shears and pastepot he is allso lost. A Editor and his shears and postepot are inseparible. A Editor smils only when he is having his pictur took which is not often. When anybody wants to find out something they ask the Editor if he don't no he will make you think he does. Anyway the editor is a supearear person because he is usually able to make his bluff good. More can be said about Editors than any other specys especially by printers and reporters.

A editor is often a has-been printer and he is proud of the tack but he don't like printers. Contrary to the geniral rule the Editor is made not born. He is made like a mashine so that he can work like one. His wheels often run amuk like one, but he allways gets them together again by the next isshu goes to press. A Editor nos all about politicks but he is not a politishun. He rites but he can't talk. Politishuns talk but it is the Editor who corecks there grammer and spellin'. Editors don't no when they are telling the truth because it would not fill more than ¼ of the paper. If ignorence is blis it is follie to be wise, so the Editor is wise when it serves his purpose. A Editor never takes a vacation unles it is to attend a meeting of the nashinal editorial assoseashun. When the Editor goes home he cusses everybody round the shop for not geting out a good paper in his absence, but he nos all the time that his absence was an emprovement. —Tacoma (Wash.) Daily News.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc.

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. THE LIMEKILN CLUB.

Brother Gardner Makes Some Remarks on the Rabbit Foot.

THE FIRST COLORED MAN.

He Was a Mistah Ham and, According to the President, Has Brought Luck to All Those Who Have Followed His Footsteps.

[Copyright, 1908, by T. C. McClure.]

As the president of the Limekiln club rose up to speak he placed a rabbit's foot on his left and another on his right, and after seriously regarding them for a moment he said:

"My frens, I reckon dat you all know dat de first cull'd man bo'n into dis yere world was a Mistah Ham. What his front name was nobody seems to know. Mistah Ham has de honoh of bein' de first man, black or white, to diskiber dat de rabbit's foot brought luck, and since dat time ebery cull'd man has follered in his footsteps.

"HE GOT ME TO HUNTIN' THROUGH GRAVEYARDS AT MIDNIGHT."

"It has come to my knowledge dat Giveadam Jones sleeps wid a rabbit's foot under his pillar at night.

"Dat Elder Penstock has carried one in his coattail pocket for de last forty-four years.

"Dat Waydown Bebee wears one tied to his left leg to keep de rheumaticks away.

"Dat Samuel Shin believes he would have been murdered by a ghost if he hadn't produced his rabbit's foot jest in de nick of time.

"Dat Kurnel White jilted de woman he was gwine to marry last month kase de rabbit's foot curled up a little.

"Dat Jedge Kabiff keeps burglars away from his cabin by hangin' a foot on de doah.

"I has heard all dis and a heap mo', and de time has come to tell you dat you am makin' fools of yourselves. De man who kin show me dat dar' am mo' luck in a rabbit's foot dan in a raw tater or turnip kin make $100 right away. In de first place, de rabbit is a fool animal. He can't fight, he can't roar, he can't crawl, and he don't know 'nuff to run straight. He jest goes foolin' around on airth till somebody knocks him out and eats him up. He's skeered from de day he is bo'n to de hour of his death. Sunthin or somebody is allus arter him, and he never has any luck 'tall.

"In de second place, luck hain't comin' to nobody through any fool thing. You has got to git up mighty airly in de mawnin' and hunt all day for luck. She'll come to you jest as quick if you are carryin' a head of cabbage under your arm as she will if you have a rabbit's foot tied to your neck.

Mistah Ham's Idea.

"Mistah Ham got de idea dat dar was luck in a rabbit's foot. When and whar did it bring him luck? 'Cordin' to all de accounts I have read of him, he had a hard time of it in dis world, and he didn't have much of a funeral purcession when he finally passed away. How does it come, den, dat so many of you are follerin' Mistah Ham?

"Dar was a time in my life when I was a fool believer in de rabbit's foot. I was young, and it was an old nigger man dat told me about it. He got me to huntin' through graveyards at midnight in de second quarter of de moon to kill a rabbit. Lawd love ye, I was skeered to death for six months. Den I finally killed a rabbit and got both front paws. Den dat old nigger man told me I was heeled for anything dat come along, and I was fool 'nuff to believe it and bring down consequences on my head.

"I tackled a big cull'd feller dat was arter my gal, and he wolloped me so dat I didn't git out of de house for two weeks.

"I craved for pork and got arter a hawg belongin' to a white man. I had both dose feet wid me, and I orter got dat pork and got away wid it, but dar was a slip up. Dat white man got me instead, and I went to jail for a month.

"I was courtin' a powerful fine cull'd gal. Dem rabbit's feet orter brought me luck. Did dey? Not much. When I axed dat gal for her heart and hand she throwed me down for a cross eyed nigger dat didn't know a possum from a persimmon.

"I worked till I had $70 in my pocket, and den I started out to buy a mewl. Dem rabbit's feet was wid me. I found a mewl and planked down de money and led him home. Jest as I got home I turned around and diskibered dat I had been leadin' a cold corpse for de last half mile. Dat mewl had had a fit and expired.

"On an occashun I hankered arter some green co'n and sot out in de night to visit a field. I figgered dat dem two feet was good for fo' dozen ears. But what happened? Why, de white man was on de watch and filled me so full of bird shot dat I couldn't jump over a tow string for de next month.

Kissed Rabbit's Feet.

"I had one mo' case befo' I quit. I found $20 in de road and no one in sight. Dat was my money for shore. I needed it. I took out dem rabbit's feet and kissed 'em in gratitude, and I was still kissin' when a robber jumped out and not only took de money, but left me wid a headache dat continued for two straight years.

"Dar am jest on single occashun when a rabbit's foot may possibly bring luck. Dat am arter you has stood in front of a grocery for about two hours lookin' at a great big heap of watermillyons.

"Your eyes has bulged out.

"Your mouf has watered.

"You has felt your heels lift up.

"In imagination you have devoured fo' of de biggest and de ripest and de sweetest—ebery one of 'em wid a core as red as de heart of an ox.

"You has gone frew all dis and den had to back away bekase you hadn't a cent in your pocket and knew dat de grocer wouldn't trust. You has gone home feelin' de iron in your soul, but to suddenly remember of a melon patch about a mile away. You have a rabbit's foot. You know dat it won't be a moonlight night. You dimly remember of hearin' dat de owner of de patch am away on his vacation.

"When de chill'en have gone to roost you wink at de old woman.

"Not a word am spoken, but she knows what dat wink spells.

"She goes out in de wood shed and brings you in an old coffee sack and pats you on de shoulder and gives you into de keepin' of Providence.

"You sot out. You saunter along keerlessly. You whistle and you sing. If you meet a policeman he takes you for a happy darky gwine to cote your gal.

"You reach dat field. You walk along de fence. You talk to your rabbit's foot, and bimeby you find a hole to creep through. De millyons am dar. You kin smell 'em. Dey have been waitin' for thee. Dey am so anxious to be picked and eaten dat dey almost come rollin' at you.

"And now, wid dat rabbit's foot in your teeth and your heart tunkin', you sarch around for de biggest and de best, an old red one, and a few seconds later it am in de sack, and you feel like shoutin' out glory.

"Den comes de crisis. I have known dat rabbit's foot to help a man git back home wid de millyon and have de feast of his life, and I have known it to give him dead away to a white man, a bulldog and a shotgun. Can't nobber tell what it will do, and I reckon de safest way am to look around instead for a ham dat a butcher may have left hangin' outdoahs when he closed his shop for de night.

"I hain't gwine to say dat no member of dis Limekiln club must believe in de luck of a rabbit's foot, but I am tellin' you dat when you am holdin' a pair of aces and de odder man has threes all de rabbits' feet in de hull world hain't gwine to let you rake in dat pot to buy a sealskin cap wid."

THE REPUBLICAN

BENJ. H. SINCELL, EDITOR.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1909.

Republican Ticket.

For Comptroller of the State Treasury, of Cecil County.

For Judge of the Fourth Judicial District
D. LINDLEY SLOAN
of Allegany County.

For State Senator,
HARVEY J. SPEICHER.

For House of Delegates,

J. ELBERT CHAPPELL.

For Sheriff,

For County Commissioners,
DARIUS M. DIXON,
WALTER M. LOWDERMILK.

For Clerk to County Commissioners,
ALBERT G. ROSS.

For County Surveyor,
JAMES A. SINCELL.

D. LINDLEY SLOAN.

With the nomination of Mr. D. Lindley Sloan, of Cumberland, for Chief Judge of the Fourth Judicial District, the Republican ticket in every county composing the district is strengthened and the Republican voters of Garrett county will take pleasure in casting their ballots for this honorable and worthy gentleman to preside over our courts.

Commenting upon Mr. Sloan's nomination, this morning's Cumberland News says:

"Mr. D. Lindly Sloan, the Republican candidate for the chief judgeship of the Fourth Judicial Circuit, whose unanimous nomination at the Hagerstown convention Tuesday, was a tribute to the fitness of the man for the high office with which his party seeks to honor him, is a militant young Republican who has proved his fitness for public office. The action taken at the convention at Hagerstown, leaves nothing to be desired in the way of an admirable candidate for the office. With such a man as Mr. Sloan, there can be no excuse for political delinquency at the polls in November.

"Mr. Sloan is a man of prominence and of the highest standing. He is known throughout all Allegany county and the Fourth Judicial District as possessed of unimpeachable integrity, keen atility, thorough honesty and exceptional fitness for the position for which he has been named. Ripe in experience and gifted with more than ordinary intelligence and good judgment, the nomination is the most appropriate that could have been made. Mr. Sloan should be supported not alone by all who are enrolled under the emblem of Republicanism, but as well by many of opposite political faith. And this is said without prejudice to the present Chief Justice and Democratic nominee."

CENSUS SHOWS CHURCH MEMBERSHIP GROWING.

No more interesting report has emanated from the Census Bureau for many a month than one which has just been issued on the subject of religious bodies in the United States. This report ought to serve to correct on idea entertained by many people that church membership is getting out of fashion and that fewer people are going to church than in the olden days.

The facts are, as the census figures show, that church membership has increased more rapidly than population. Of the total estimated population of continental United States in 1906, over 39 per cent. were reported as church members. The corresponding percentage for 1890 was 32.7, showing a material gain in the number of church members in sixteen years.

According to the statistics, eight new churches were erected every day in the sixteen years from 1890 to 1906, the number of religious denominations is 186, the local religious organizations are 212,230, the number of church members nearly 33,000,000, and the amount invested in church edifices is over a billion and a quarter dollars. Nothing in the report indicates that the United States as a nation is growing less religious. On the contrary, it would seem to be growing in the other direction. Science is moving on and the Bible is not getting any less potent in its hold on the American people.

Of course, the men will refrain from saying much about that phase of the census figures which shows that the males form but 43.1 per cent of the total membership.

CAN A CHILD EVER REPAY THE DEBT IT OWES ITS MOTHER?

A recent issue of the Baltimore Sun contains the following splendid editorial which should be read by every son and daughter who is blessed with a faithful and devoted mother:

Many a mother literally gives her life for her child. In health watching over it day by day and hour by hour, in sickness never leaving its bedside, watching every moment under the protecting wing of mother love. This is a pathetic little story that comes from West Virginia. Mrs. Grace Smith, of Beverly, had been watching for weary hours at the bedside of her sick child. She was poor, and must not only care for the little one, but earn enough for support. She remained up all night with the child, and without closing her eyes went to work at dawn and spent all the morning laboring at the wash tub. Then she went out in the heat of the day to pick blackberries and walked several miles to town. When she reached the store she fell to the floor exhausted, and died before she could be restored to consciousness. The doctors said she had literally worked herself to death.

How many mothers there are who have given their youth and beauty and good looks and health and strength—have spent it all for their children? And then when the lines of care mark their faces with wrinkles and their hair is streaked with gray, how many are rewarded by the devotion and care of those for whom they have done so much? Not as many as there should be. "But mother is so old," you hear a fresh young girl say, "she wouldn't care for music or flowers or drives or sails down the bay." And she rushes off, never giving her another though. Children take as a matter of course the constant devotion of their parents and are often impatient that they connot give them more. Many a mother has toiled and striven for long years to rear her daughter into a charming, attractive woman, only to find that the girl does not appreciate and can hardly conceive the sacrifices made for her. Perhaps the little girl for whom the patient woman worked herself to death might grow up to be ashamed of the fact that her mother ever worked at a wash tub or picked blackberries to support her little flock.

The wrinkled face of a mother is illumined by a love and refined by a sacrifice that make it more beautiful than the glowing cheek of the vain young woman who races through the world with no thought except of self and no care except for her own beauty and pleasure. Parents do not mind making these sacrifices. They are made every day in a million homes, and the devotion of parents to their children is perhaps the best proof that human nature, in spite of its many faults and shortcoming, is, as a whole, wholesome and good. But the parents do have a right to expect from their children some appreciation, and the least that the girls and boys can give is devotion and consideration and the love that means more to father and mother than all else. "How sharper than a serpent's tooth is an ungrateful child?"

Lightning Killed Cow.

Last Saturday night one of a herd of twenty Jersey cows belonging to Mr. E. E. Sollars of the Chestnut Grove Dairy Farm, near Oakland, was struck and instantly killed by a bolt of lightning which descended, first striking an oak tree and passing completely through the trunk at a height of about fifteen feet from the ground and then to the animal which was some ten feet or more away. Marks on the cow indicated that she was feeding when the lightning struck her just above the hips on her spine and running the entire length of her body entered the earth at her nose. Fortunately no other animals were injured, although they were all nearby. Mr. Sollars valued the animal killed at $50.

Socialist Candidate for Judge.

At a meeting of the Hagerstown Socialist party Thursday night Harry H. Cooper, of Hagerstown, was selected as the Socialist candidate for judge for the Fourth circuit. His name will go on the ballot by petition, about 300 names of voters being required. Allegany county socialists delegated the Hagerstown Socialists to select the nominee. Cooper is a telegraph operator.

Millennium Due in 1914.

Believers in the early dawn of the millennium are gathering at Saratoga, N. Y., from several states for their annual conference, which began yesterday. For four days services will be held in Convention hall. The followers of the sect believe that in 1914, "after times of great trouble," the world is to be transformed into a paradise. They profess to find their foundation for this belief in the study of scripture prophecies, which form the principal theme of study at the meetings.

The conference is under the auspices of the Watch Tower Bible and Tract society. The organization's headquarters are in Brooklyn and the convention upon concluding its meetings at Saratoga on Friday will adjourn to that city for the final services on Sunday.

Notice to the Public.

We hereby give notice to the public that by mutual agreement we have this day, August 10, 1909, given our son, George M. Funk, his freedom, and that we are no longer responsible for any transaction that he may enter into.

GOOD ROADS CONFERENCE AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK

Interesting Meetings Held and a Permanent Organization Affected.

The Inter-state Good Roads Conference began at Mountain Lake Park Friday night with a banquet at the Mountain Lake Hotel. About 50 people were present. Judge Thomas Ireland Elliot, of the Supreme Bench of Baltimore, was toastmaster.

Among the speakers were Charles P. Light, Highway Commissioner of West Virginia; George B. Hulbert, of Marietta, Ohio, representing the good roads division of the Agriculeural Department Dr. C. W. Baldwin, of Baltimore, president of the Mountain Lake Park Association; and Gilmor S. Hamill, of the Oakland Bar. Dr. W. W. Davis, superintendent of Mountain Lake Park, was chairman of the banquet committee and introduced Judge Elliot.

The meetings Saturday were largely attended. The delegates went on a drive of 10 miles through Garrett county Friday afternoon. They visited Oakland.

The conference was presided over in the morning by Dr. W. W. Davis, superintendent of Mountain Lake Park. Charles P. Light, Highway Commissioner of West Virginia, made the opening address. He discussed the proposed roadbuilding plans for West Virginia, stating that preparations were being made to begin work on a large scale in the near future. A road engineer is to be appointed in each county by January 1. Mr. Light was named Highway Commissioner of West Virginia by Governor Glasscock on the endorsement of President Taft.

Dr. White, State Geologist of West Virginia, discussed the different kinds of roadbuilding in the State and referred especially to the brick road which was built out from Cameron to a suburban town, two miles. The road was made of the ordinary vitrified brick, and it was lasting well. Following these addresses, there was a general discussion, in which Gen. Alexander Clohan, postmaster of Martinsburg, W. Va., spoke.

Mr. George Baker, an attorney of Morgantown, W. Va., presided at the afternoon session. Mr. A. W. Wilson, of Harford county, Maryland, spoke on the road work accomplished in that county. He opposed the Shoemaker system of road construction in Maryland, saying the cost of maintenance was too great.

Prof. George B. Hulbert, of Marietta, representing the good roads division of the Agricultural Department, spoke at length on "Road Economies."

At night Charles H. Hoyt, of Washington, representing the Secretary of Agriculture, gave on illustrated lecture on "The Alpha and Omega" of good roads. He touched on different kinds of roads constructed, and his talk was made plainer by illustration.

The conference adjourned Monday after affecting permanent organization. The new organization will be known as the Inter-State Good Roads Association and its object to promote "the construction and maintainance of good roads." An executive committee was formed and among its duties is the appointment of a county chairman in the several counties of the states represented and in co-operation with the county chairman secure the appointment of one or more persons from each election precinct in the various countiss or cities in the several states. These persons so appointed, together with the county chairman, shall constitue a good roads committee whose duty shall be the promotion of the construction and maintainance of good roads. The following officers were elected:

President, Dr. John F. Goucher, Baltimore; first vice president, Dr. I. C. White, state geologist, Morgantown, W. Va.,; second vice president, Hon. Thomas Ireland Elliott, Baltimore; third vice president, C. Lloyd Ritter; fourth vice president, Dr. William Bullock Clark, Maryland State geologist, Baltimore; fifth vice president, Prof. Archer Butler Hulbert, Marietta College, Marietta, Ohio; recording secretary W. A. Wheeler, Belair, Md.; corresponding secretary, Dr. W. W. Davis, Mountain Lake Park; treasurer, D. M. Dixon, Oakland. Executive committee: State Senator Howard Sutherland, Elkins, W. Va., chairman; George C. Baker, Morgantown, W. Va.; John M. Tucker of the Maryland Good Roads Commission, Baltimore; Gilmor S. Hamill, Oakland, and Charles P. Light, Charleston, highway commissioner for West Virginia. The honorary vice presidents consists of the governors and the congressman of the several patronizing states.

Among the speakers at the session Monday morning were E. D. Baker, road engineer of West Virginia; Alexander Clohan, postmaster of Martinsburg, W. Va.; Dr. I. C. White and Prof. Archer B. Hulbert. Dr. John F. Goucher, of Baltimore, has taken a great interest in the conference. He gave an interesting talk on the highways of European countries. The chief subject for discussion at the conference Monday was the King Drag.

Prof. L. C. Corbett, horticulturist of the Agriculture Department, reached Mountain Lake Park Monday night. He will give the forests of Garrett county a thorough inspection. He comes under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, who will co-operate in preserving the forests of Garrett county, the great forestry section of Maryland.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. EVA MARIA SHAFFER.

Mrs. Eva Maria Shaffer died early Sunday morning, Aug. 29th, after a brief illness. She was born June 23, 1839, and was therefore a little over 70 years old. She was the daughter of David and Lydia S. Wilt, long since passed away. Her grandparents were among the early settlers of this region, all having come here in the latter part of the eighteenth century. She was a native of what was then Virginia, as she was born on a farm on the Northwestern Pike, a few miles from the Maryland line. Later her father moved to the farm on which she died and where she spent most of her life. In 1859 she married George Hauser, who died 1863. Two children were born to them, David E. and Lydia Georgianna. She then married the late Benjamin F. Shaffer, who died in 1907. To them was born five children: Franklin B., Minnie M., John A., Charles H., and Patrick H. All of her children survives her, except Lydia Georgianna, who died in 1892. Practically for all her life she was a devout Lutheran and gave much towards sustaining the Red House Lutheran church. Her years were rich in usefulness, cheer and comfort to others, and it may truly be said that her whole life was one great and devoted sacrifice for those whom she loved and were dear to her, and as her days drew to a close her only regret was that she could do no more. The troubles and sorrows that fell to her lot were borne bravely and cheerfully and when she realized that the end was approaching she went out into the great beyond without a murmer, without a complaint. Time may dull our grief, but can never lessen the sense of our great loss.

ELIAS MERRILL.

Ex-Judge Elias Merrill of the Orphans' Court, died at his residence at Merrill, Garrett county, last Friday after an illness of long standing of stomach trouble. Mr. Merrill was aged nearly 72 years and was a life-long resident of Garrett county. For many years he was engaged in the saw mill business and also in the mercantile line. He leaves surviving him his wife, three sons and two daughters, all of whom are grown. His funeral took place from his late home Sunday, the services being conducted by Rev. John T. Green, of the German Baptist church, of which Mr. Merrill was a consistent member.

GEORGE BASIL.

Died, at The Rest, yesterday morning, of tuberculosis, George Basil, who came here from his home in Baltimore Tuesday afternoon on train No. 55 with the hope that the mountain air would at least prolong his life. He ate a hearty breakfast about eight o'clock yesterday morning and in an hour afterward he was dead. No arrangements have as yet been made for the the funeral, but it is presumed that his remains will be forwarded to his home for interment.

JACOB C. BLOCHER.

Jacob C. Blocher, aged 32 years, was found dead at his home in Meyersdale, Pa., last Friday. He was a son of Joseph Blocher and was a native of Grantsville.

Gas Demonstration at Terra Alta.

Last night a demonstration was given at Terra Alta by representatives of the Northern Natural Gas Company similar to the exhibition here August 1st when the gas was turned into the mains of Oakland. Great crowds were present at our sister town and a magnificent spectacle was witnessed when the gas was ignited. It was kept burning for an hour or more, the reflection in the western sky being plainly visible at Oakland.

Executor's Sale
OF VALUABLE
Real Estate

Under and by virtue of a power conferred upon the undersigned as Executor of the last will and testament of Martha Warren, deceased, now of record in the Orphans' Court of Garrett county, he will on

SATURDAY,
the 18th Day of September,

1909, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M., in front of the First National Bank, in the town of Oakland, Maryland, offer for sale at public auction, all the following described real estate situated adjoining the town of Oakland on the South side, and in what is generally known as "Clatonsville."

1. All that part of Military Lot No. 863 lying South of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and contained within the fence lines maintained by the said Martha Warren, said fence lines being located near the original Military Lot lines of Lot No. 863, or that portion of it South of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad as aforesaid; except about one-half acre which was devised by the said Martha Warren to Levi Zwyers. The part hereby offered for sale contains about five acres and is improved by three dwelling houses, a couple of stables and other outbuildings, and presents a most excellent opportunity to secure a home and location for any one desiring to engage in the trucking or poultry business, as Oakland is known and recognized as a splendid market for all products of this kind.

2. All that part of Military Lot No. 863, lying on the Northeast side of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and between said Railroad and what is known as the "Dead Pond;" this part contains six acres, is unimproved, but presents a splendid opportunity for an investment, as the same is within the town limits, and has about 800 feet frontage on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, convenient to switches and suitable for docks, warehouses or manufacturing establishments, and is the only railroad frontage now available for said purposes within said town.

Terms of sale, Cash.

FRED. A. THAYER, Executor.

I will also, at the same time and place, as agent for Levi Zweyer, offer at public auction the half acre above reserved. The same is improved by a dwelling house, and a number of trees of choice fruit.

Plat of the whole may be seen at my office.

ITALIAN WORKMEN JACK THEIR JOBS

Contractor Tunny's Force Quit In a Body Yesterday Morning.

Yesterday morning the gang of Italians employed by Contracter William Tunny, who is engaged in installing the water system in Oakland, quit a body and without moment's notice, the cause being the discharge of one of the sub-bosses, an Italian, whose work did not suit the newly installed superintendent.

The sub-boss was instructed to report at the office and while he was away another Italian who had been working with the gang of sewermen, was placed over them. When the men in the trench on Liberty street were made acquainted with the state of affair they with one accord threw down their tools and left their work, going to their shanty at the old planing mill east of town.

Another crowd of the men at work in a remote part of the town, as soon as they found out what their fellew countrymen had done, also quit and the work is at a standstill.

Contractor Tunny stated yesterday afternoon that he would have another crowd of men here in a day or two and that the work would go on without further hindrance.

Hereafter the R. F. D. will be simply R. D., and you can mark your mail matter "R. D." The government has issued orders that the use of the word "Free" be dropped and that the service be known as plain Rural Delivery. The service has become so general that there is no longer any need of using the Free part of the title. The change is commendable.

WANTED—A four, five or six room cottage with bath-room and natural gas. A desirable tennant will pay $150 to $200 per year. Posession wanted about October 1st. See E. S. WEST, the Real Estate Man. 26-2t

This office is in receipt of a letter from Mr. Richard S. Browning, at present and for the past year located at Saint Joe, Idaho, where he is proprietor of a large hotel and is prosperous in his business undertakings. Mr. Browning's hotel is located at the head of navigation of the Swift Water River and is in the heart of an extensive wilderness where deer, bear and elk hunting is both pleasurable and profitable.

Garthright will have a car of strictly No. 1 corn and oats chop by Monday; also kiln-dried cracked corn and corn meal, and the very best winter wheat bran and fancy wheat middling which will be sold at the lowest cash or trade prices. 25-3t

State's Attorney Julius C. Renninger, one of the Garrett delegation at Hagerstown Tuesday, went from that city to Washington, D. C., where he took a boat for Old Point Comfort, Va., yesterday morning, being joined there by Mr. D. E. Offutt, Jr., and from Old Point they went to Atlantic City by water where a number of days will be spent by the two gentlemen. Mr. W. A. Smith, of Hoyes, and Mr. B. H. Sincell, of Oakland, the other members of the delegation to Hagerstown, returned to Oakland Tuesday night.

Cackling Hens and Crowing Roosters.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have full charge of municipal affairs in Washington. Citizens there are not called upon to vote, that being a thing of the past. Complaints of crowing roosters at daybreak, however, have been so numerous, that a novel plan was initiated to ascertain just what to do. Some one suggested that officers go from door to door and ascertain the sentiments of the occupants. Some had given it no thought, while others felt that a crowing rooster at early dawn was quite on a par with a barking dog. The noisy rooster must go, and the Commissioners will issue the necessary edict at once.

Property Changes.

As agent for the owners Mr. E. S. West, the Oakland real estate man, sold since last Friday several pieces of town and suburban property, among the sales being the following: The Mrs. Mary S. Brown cottage and 1½ acres of land surrounding it to Mr. W. S. Martin, of Worthington, W. Va., who will greatly improve the residence and will occupy it at once. Mr. Martin is a practical silversmith and will go into business here. Mr. West also disposed of a lot belonging to Miss Julia Maroney, located on High street, to Miss Abby Orme, of Savannah, Ga., who will erect a cottage upon the lot in the spring. He also sold the farm of Mr. F. Y. Lohr, near Bittinger, to Mr. John D. Miller, of Grantsville.

Farm for Sale.

I offer my farm in District No. 4 for sale. It contains 172 acres, one-third under fence and about forty acres cleared. About 250 bearing apple trees and 10 pear trees are on the place. Well watered and is two and a-half miles from the B. & O. R. R. About 200,000 feet of oak timber and 1,000 ties may be cut from the woodland. Terms will be made to suit purchaser.

MONTH WILL BE MILD.

Fair Weather Predicted For September in This Section.

The weather for September as predicted by Peter R. Smith is as follows:

The disturbing elements denote September a very fair month in central parts and also including Eastern and Southern sections should not Gulf storms arise. Early frosts are likely to show up in northern parts. The rainfall for the month will be below the average in most sections. September will likely have one heated period lasting for several days.

Thundershowers will appear in Western parts on or about the 2d or 3d, and these conditions will continue through the 4th and 5th as the showers pass on eastward. This disturbance will touch most parts of the country in rain, wind, or cloudy weather. Clearing cooler weather will follow the disturbance for a few days.

The 10th will be the center of a wave of disturbance, which will be on transit in the several sections of the country to the 14th. The period from the 9th to the 12th will be very warm and storms of rain and wind will touch most parts of the country. The magnetic center of equilibrium falls south of the equator on the 21st of the month, which notifies the approach of autumn.

A renewal of storm conditions will become manifest on the 15th, 16th, and 17th, which will likely bring refreshing showers to most sections of the country. After the passage of the wave cooler weather will follow and frost in northern parts of the country will show up about the 17th or 18th.

On the 21st a storm wave will be on transit in the central valleys. The period will bring changes in temperature about the 19th and storms of wind, rain, and thunder will be developed as the wave moves east. On its transit most parts of the country will be touched by the action of the wave in some form by rain or wind. The storms of the period will bring frost to many parts of the country, mostly to northern sections.

The 26th, 27th, and 28th will be days on which storms of wind and rain will prevail at many places, and it also denotes much intensity of the wave which will be prolonged into October.

BLOOM UPON THE BUCKWHEAT.

Bloom is on the buckwheat where the glades of Garrett lie,
The hills of Allegany, whose green ridges touch the sky;
The white bloom of the buckwheat; oh, my heart, how sweet it glows
A drift of dreamy beauty and a dream of drifted snows;
The ripe oats just beside it, and in orchards sweet with tune,
The bumble-bees and clover and the honey-hives of June;
The bloom, the bloom is blowing,
In the buckwheat fields on high,
Where the hills of Allegany
And the glades of Garrett lie!

A rough road up the mountain, with a smooth stretch here and there;
A peak of rain-ribbed granite, like a phantom in the air;
A mine-mouth down by Eckhart and the Knobley hills asleep
While down the dream-deep valleys like a toy of huge trains creep;
Potomac like a dewdrop, and the green hills fresh as dew,
With beauty bending o'er them from the blue sky's bowl of blue;
The buckwheat bloom in glory,
In modest glory shines,
In the green glades of old Garrett
O'er the Allegany mines!

The oats are ripe for harvest and with song the reaper fills
The ridges of Big Savage and the groves of Piney Hills;
Through glen and burn it echoes, and the Narrows grandly glow
Where trolley cars and engines of the huge trains crawl below;
A spiritual voice of summer and the breath of her so sweet,
Where man has carved the mountain side and climbed it street by street;
The bloom, the white bloom yonder,
The buckwheat bloom of snow,
Where swarms of gold bees wander
And dim vales dream below!

Bloom is on the buckwheat in the buckwheat lands whose crest
Gleams where the glades of Garrett role along the rims of rest,
Where dreams old Allegany in her vales of mist and haze
The dream that brings the old hearts back the dream of other days;
The ripe oats hear the reaper and the honey hears the bees,
Sweet in the swoon of many a tune of sylvan melodies!
The bloom, the bloom is blowing,
In the fields against the sky,
Where hills of Allegany
And glades of Garrett lie!

His Broken Promise.

By COLIN S. COLLINS.

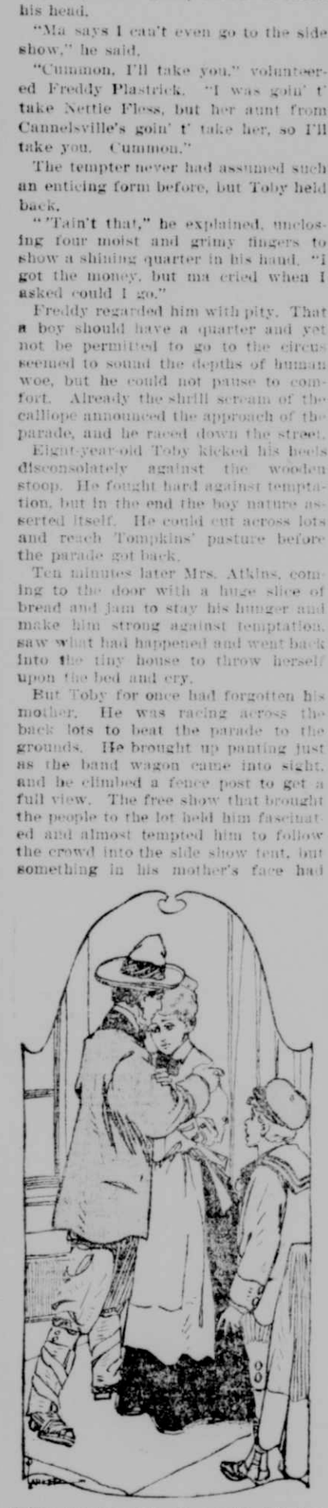
Copyrighted, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.

"Goin' to th' circus?" Toby glanced longingly at the gaudy bills as he shook his head.

"Ma says I can't even go to the side show," he said.

"Cummon, I'll take you," volunteered Freddy Plastrick. "I was goin' t' take Nettie Fless, but her aunt from Cannelsville's goin' t' take her, so I'll take you. Cummon."

The tempter never had assumed such an enticing form before, but Toby held back.



"'Tain't that," he explained, unclosing four moist and grimy fingers to show a shining quarter in his hand. "I got the money, but ma cried when I asked could I go."

Freddy regarded him with pity. That a boy should have a quarter and yet not be permitted to go to the circus seemed to sound the depths of human woe, but he could not pause to comfort. Already the shrill scream of the calliope announced the approach of the parade, and he raced down the street.

Eight-year-old Toby kicked his heels disconsolately against the wooden stoop. He fought hard against temptation, but in the end the boy nature asserted itself. He could cut across lots and reach Tompkins' pasture before the parade got back.

Ten minutes later Mrs. Atkins, coming to the door with a huge slice of bread and jam to stay his hunger and make him strong against temptation, saw what had happened and went back into the tiny house to throw herself upon the bed and cry.

But Toby for once had forgotten his mother. He was racing across the back lots to beat the parade to the grounds. He brought up panting just as the band wagon came into sight, and he climbed a fence post to get a full view. The free show that brought the people to the lot held him fascinated and almost tempted him to follow the crowd into the side show tent, but something in his mother's face had sunk deep into his heart. He would play truant, but he would not go to the circus.

"I'VE FOUND YOU AT LAST," HE WAS SAYING.

He wandered about the lot. It was only a two ring show, but the horse tent fascinated him, and he lingered, watching the men take the gaudy trappings from the horses and give them feed and water.

Almost unconsciously he strolled through the dressing tent and into the "big top" where the performance would be given later. He seemed oddly at home somehow, and he sat down on the bank of one of the rings where a group of men were tumbling on a pad.

One of them dropped out of the group and sat down beside him. He was a tall, dark man, with a kindly face and a smile that would win the confidence of any child. Toby smiled upon him and so attracted attention to himself.

"Hello!" cried the man. "What are you doing here, youngster? I thought you were Metcalf's kid."

"I just came in," explained Toby, as though such a proceeding were most natural. "I can do those things."

The big man laughed. Most small boys could "do those things" after a fashion and were anxious to show off before the circus folk.

"Let's see what you can do," he suggested as the others paused for a rest. Toby made for the mat. Somehow he seemed to remember tricks long since forgotten. Somehow also he seemed to remember doing just these same things in a ring like this one, and he gravely went through his repertory.

The men crowded about the mat, laughing and crying encouragement, but it was the big man to whom Toby turned for applause.

"You're a 'pro' kid all right," he declared. "I guess you've seen the rings before. Want to come with us, kid? We could use a light boy."

"I've got to stay with mother," Toby announced regretfully. "I'm all she's got, you see, and she can't spare me."

"What does your mother do?" demanded the big man. He had known mothers who were open to argument, and the boy gave promise of being an addition to the troupe.

"She makes hats and sews," explained Toby. "We live over there on Grove street."

"Over there" was indicated by a semicircular sweep of the arm, and the big man pulled out a watch from the coat he had resumed.

"You want to come with us if your mother will let you?" he asked.

Toby's face fell.

"She won't," he said dolefully. "She hates circuses. She's going to whip me when I get home. She made me promise not to come, not even to look at the parade."

"He's a circus boy, all right, Ted," laughed one of the other men. "She knew that if he hit the tents it would all come back to him, and it has. He worked like a veteran. He'd make a great top mounter."

"He's going to make one," announced Ted. "I'm goin' to see his mother. I don't know what grouch she's got against us show folks, but I'll talk her out of it. Come, kid."

He held out a hand to Toby, and together they left the tent. Ted stopped to speak to a man in the dressing tent, and then they struck out across lots for the tiny little home where for the last four years Rena Atkins had sought to support herself and her son by millinery and dressmaking. She was on the steps now peering up and down the street, hoping against hope that Toby would come. But at the sight of the man with him she shrank into the house, though not before the stranger had caught sight of her and had gone bounding forward.

When Toby's shorter legs had compassed the distance he found his mother in the stranger's arms striving to fight him off. Toby valiantly came to the rescue with feet and fists, but the big man seemed scarcely to notice the attack.

"I've found you at last," he was saying. "Why did you run away, dear?"

"You ask me that?" Her voice was quiet now and tense with scorn. "Let me go and I will show you."

His arms dropped to his side, and she slipped across the room to where her pocketbook lay. Silently she offered a slip of paper frayed with handling and yellowed with age.

"You believed this?" asked the man. "You really thought I had eloped with Clara Grey? We left the same night because Griffith was doing us out of our salaries. Her husband, Jim Grey, was playing with Cole's circus, and she joined him. I played a couple of houses for expense money to get back home with. I wrote, but the letter was there at the boarding house when I arrived. They told me you had gone. Griffith put that lying notice in the paper to hide the real reason for our leaving, his own dishonesty."

"And I believed it," she sobbed, "and I've been trying to hide ever since to keep the boy from being like his father."

"It's in the blood," the big man said tenderly. "Why, the kiddie came into the big top and saw us working on the mat, and he went at it like he used to in the old days. I never guessed that he was my child. I only saw what a great top mounter he would make, and I came to see if you would apprentice him to us. I never hoped to find a wife and little son where I was looking for a topper."

"You—you forgive me?" she faltered.

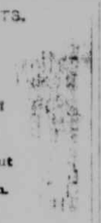
"You were just a foolish little child to run away before you found out the truth," he said, with a tender laugh. "It's all the more reason you should have a husband to look after you, and I know that Toby wants a father."

"You bet I do," put in Toby, at last finding something he could understand. "Are you my dad?"

"I am that," said the big man as he hugged Toby to his breast. "And you're a true chip of the old block. Why, laddie, I taught you these tricks you showed us this afternoon. It all came out when you saw a ring again."

"I'm glad I broke my promise," said Toby complacently, "even if I am whipped for it."

But the whipping was deferred indefinitely.



Witches' Brooms Do Not Injure Trees.

Among the objects which the leafless season of the year makes conspicuous in our woods and hedgerows are certain dark, almost globular agglomerations of small twigs on the boughs of many different kinds of trees which at first sight look like birds' nests. They are what are popularly known as witches' blooms or brooms. They are usually the results of some bygone disturbance in the economy of a shoot producing bud which caused the bud to break up into several instead of continuing its onward growth as a single branch. The irritating influence which produced this result was probably applied at a very early period of the bud formation, while its development was but little advanced. Whether due to insect or fungal irritation, these brooms are not infective to the rest of the tree and do not cause decay or injure the tree in any way beyond uselessly consuming a certain amount of sap. It is possible that some of the best brooms are caused by the attacks of mites which persist in their occupancy and attack the spring buds every succeeding year.—Museum Gazette.

A Bold Rat.

A strange incident occurred at Crediton. While walking along the street a man was alarmed by something springing at him from the roadway. He brushed his hand over his coat, and a large rat fell to the ground. The incident, however, did not end there, for the rat made further attacks on the man, who experienced some difficulty in keeping it off. Several passersby came to his assistance, but it was some time before they were able to kill the rat. So wild and unusual an attack in the open street was doubtless due to the rat having lost its way back to its haunt.—London Standard.

POISONED SWEETS.

It may be sweet
Just after dark
Upon a seat
Out in the park
To sit and spoon!

'Tis joy, no doubt,
To bill and coo
When lights are out
As lovers do
Beneath the moon.

But when a kiss
He gently takes
And in his bliss
Your headgear shakes,
It's tough on hats.

When on his breast
In loving trust
Your head you rest
And get it mussed
It's rough on "rats."

The One Condition.

By MARTHA COBB SANFORD.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

Beth was reading the bargain sales announced in the Sunday paper.

"We can get a morris chair, Nell, for five-eighty-nine!" she cried enthusiastically. "It's the opportunity of a lifetime!"

"Any bargains in lace waists?" Nell asked irrelevantly.

Beth laid down the paper in disgust.

"You're changing, Nell Stafford," she said sternly, "and not for the better. You used to be crazy over fixing up this little flat. Now all you think of is clothes, and you know we agreed that clothes shouldn't count until we got everything we wanted in the way of household furnishings."

"But there's no end to it, Beth," Nell pleaded. "The flat looks well enough. In fact, it's beginning to look better than we do. It's time we began to live up to our surroundings."

"I suppose you mean Dick Wheeler," Beth interpreted. "I notice he constitutes your surroundings most of the time."

Nell ignored the lambendo.

"Everything I possess is old fashioned and unbecoming," she continued. "I've been awfully patient, Beth; really I have. I just love pretty clothes and I'm going to have some if we never have a morris chair, so there!"

As Nell grew excited Beth became calmer.

"Considering what close friends we are, Nell," she said quietly, "I think you might tell me the truth."

Whereupon Nell, breaking into tears confessed her engagement.

"It wasn't that I didn't want you to know," she sobbed, "but I couldn't bear to break up the little home, Beth."

Beth pulled herself together heroically.

"It isn't going to be broken up," she said, with determination. "Of course

"I HATE SEWING," CAME A MUFFLED REPLY FROM THE PILLOW.

it won't be the same without you, Nell, but if you've got courage enough to commit matrimony after all we've said against it, why, then I guess I've got courage enough to carry out my convictions alone. Was it lace waists you asked the price of?"

This being the way Beth took the news, it was characteristic that she pursued her original intention of visiting the furniture sale during her Monday noon hour.

She had just settled down with an air of relaxation in a green cushioned morris chair, "sale price $5.89," when she was rudely startled out of it.

"This is the only one we have with green cushions, sir," a salesman declared pompously to some one on his right, bringing his hand down by way of emphasis upon the crown of Beth's hat.

Apologies, greetings and explanations followed, during which the offending salesman tactfully disappeared. It was obvious that three made no party to this chance meeting.

"Will business keep you in the city long?" inquired Beth. The question indicated more courtesy than interest.

Gilbert Taylor's eyes twinkled.

"It has kept me two years so far," he answered soberly.

"I hadn't heard," Beth said rather coldly.

"And you?" he asked. There was no doubt that his interest was genuine.

"Ah, I'm an established householder," Beth informed him with no little show of pride. "A business chum and I have a little flat together. That explains my monopoly of this morris chair. We need one, or, rather, we want one. But I've just about decided to wait until I can afford leather cushions. They're so much more aristocratic. Don't you think so?"

Gilbert agreed.

"But I'm awfully interested in this housekeeping experiment of yours, Elizabeth," he said earnestly. "I'm thinking of trying something of the sort myself. You can give me a lot of pointers. Take lunch with me, won't you?"

Elizabeth hesitated. She saw complications ahead. Nevertheless, because there was no time to analyze possible consequences, she accepted.

"The lace waists," she explained to Nell that night, "were such wonderful bargains that I got two of them."

"Two!" exclaimed Nell. "What on earth did you think I wanted with two of them?"

"One is for myself," Beth enlightened her.

Nell looked such volumes of astonishment that Beth felt obliged to make further explanation.

"The five-eighty-nine morris chair looked common," she said loftily. "I shan't get one till I can afford leather cushions. And, anyway, I've been thinking about what you said yesterday—about the flat looking better than we do. There's some truth in it."

Nell could hardly believe her ears—Beth, who took life so seriously and spelled career with a capital letter, yielding to the temptations of personal vanity. There must be some compelling reason for it.

Beth's next remark supplied it.

"I think I'll put my waist on tonight, Nell, if you'll help me. Gilbert Taylor's coming to call."

"Not the man you refused on account of your career?" gasped Nell.

"Did I ever mention refusing any one else?" Beth retorted, a bit impatiently.

* * * * * * * *

"It's as cozy as it can be," Gilbert exclaimed, looking around the artistic living room. "And it's so—so homelike." He hesitated for the proper word to express his feelings. "But I can see where a leather cushioned morris chair would be the crowning touch," he added laughingly. "Only what will you do with it, Beth, without a man in the family?"

Beth flashed a look of defiance at him. It reminded Gilbert of the old days when she had held out so persistently that she had as much right as he to an independent life of her own and meant to claim it.

"I suppose you have a notion," she answered him, with a fine show of superiority, "that morris chairs, like all other creature comforts, were invented for masculine monopoly."

"The average man is a selfish beast," he admitted good naturedly, "but I'm not. You shall sit in the morris chair every night, Beth. I won't say a word—if you'll"—

At this critical moment Nell darted in, securing a refractory hatpin in transit.

Beth introduced Gilbert.

"I was just complimenting Elizabeth on your attractive little place here, Miss Stafford," he said easily. "She thinks it needs a morris chair to make it complete, and I had the stupidity to ask what she'd do with one without a man to occupy it. You've come just in time to settle the question."

"I'm afraid I'm what you might call prejudiced, Mr. Taylor," Nell answered lightly. "I really believe in both, if you can get them. When it comes to choice—well, Beth knows my sentiments. Dick's downstairs," she added, turning to Beth, "and I mustn't keep him waiting. Good night."

She gave Gilbert an encouraging smile as she closed the hall door, but Beth was unaware of it.

"I take it Miss Stafford has matrimonial intentions," Gilbert remarked when they were alone again. "That's going to upset your little menage, isn't it, Elizabeth? What are you going to do?"

It was a brutal mistake. He knew it as soon as the question had escaped him.

But there was no audacious reply from Beth as he expected. Instead, her eyes filled, and she buried her face in the cushions, sobbing as if her heart would break.

Gilbert had never before seen Beth unequal to a situation. Her helplessness touched him deeply.

"Beth," he said gently, "I have an idea. Suppose I buy out Nell's domestic interest?"

No answer, only fewer sobs.

"You shall sit on a cushion and"—

"No; I won't sew a fine seam. I hate sewing," came a muffled reply from the pillow depths.

At that Gilbert gathered her to him, laughing joyously.

"She shall just eat strawberries, sugar and cream, then," he amended, with indulgent tenderness. "All that I insist upon is"—

He paused, and Beth, flushed and disheveled, flashed him a challenging look.

"That she shall love me," he finished softly.

And Beth accepted the one condition.

New York's Working Girls.

Before the great arc lights have begun to fizz and glow processions of work girls, of shopgirls, of professional girls, have passed up and down this great avenue of the city, which in variety of interest and in claims to one's attention forms a strong rival to the Paris boulevards.

[illegible]ese young women are typical of [illegible] York and indeed of the whole American continent. In independence, in fearlessness, in ability to act and think for themselves, they are clearly daughters of the new world, but in the taste and elegance of their clothes there is something of the Parisian spirit, of that peculiar faculty for combining colors and blending effects which is certainly the heritage of the "ouvriere" and yet seems by some mysterious means to have become wafted across the broad bosom of the Atlantic. You feel an atmosphere of well being, of solid contentment, prosperity and self esteem about the common people in the States. This is typified by these well gowned, bright and pleasing young women who carry out so large a part of the daily routine of Uncle Sam. You see no defected countenances. Why be dejected when you have the chance or at least the sweet illusion of being one day called to the highest destinies of the country?—Cor. Pall Mall Gazette.

Envious Inference.

"What a happy, good natured, jolly girl Maud is! She's always smiling and laughing."

"Yes; she has pretty teeth and dimples."

HE WAS PRETTY SMALL.

"The smallest man I ever saw," declared a commercial traveler in a local hotel the other day, "was a man whom I saved from drowning at Atlantic City one day last summer. It happened that this fellow while tipsy accidentally fell off the end of the pier in deep water. Not being able to swim he began to emit lusty yells for help as he floundered about. I chanced to be strolling in the vicinity at the time, so rushing to the spot I plunged in, clothes and all, to the rescue.

"Being an unusually strong and efficient swimmer, I soon had my man where willing hands drew us both up to safety. While I stood there, my $40 suit dripping icy water, the saved one began to blurt out his thanks. The next moment, however, he began to fumble in his vest pocket.

"'Say,' said he, eying me suspiciously, as the curious crowd closed round us, 'did you take that nickel I had in this pocket?'"—Judge.

The Secret of Strength.

The kindly, round-faced, bald-headed old gentleman was dramatically telling the Sunday school of Samson.

"He was strong," continued the speaker in summing up, "became weak and again regained his strength, which enabled him to destroy his enemies. Now, boys, if I had an enemy what would you advise me to do?"

A little boy's brows began to knit as he considered the secret of that great ancient's strength. His hand went up, then he piped mildly:

"Get a bottle of hair restorer."

His Mother.

"Mother," he said, putting his arms around her and kissing her on the brow, "I am going to marry the sweetest, the loveliest, the noblest girl in the world."

Looking up into his eyes, the good lady by a great effort managed to keep back her tears as she answered in broken tones:

"My—poor—boy!"

WHEN AMERICA IS HALF A CENTURY OLDER.

Will She Be Able To Supply The Natural Demands

In the last analysis all material wealth, all the comforts and necessities of life, are the product of two elements—nature and labor. It may be truly said that nature, or the earth, is the mother of labor and the father of all products necessary to sustain human life. The richness and prosperity of a country, therefore, depend on the presence of natural resources within its borders, such as water, minerals, forests and cultivable soils on the one hand, and intelligent human energy on the other to shape them into the forms necessary for the needs of man. Of the two elements the natural resources are indispensable, for in a country like the desert of Sahara all human effort would be of little avail. The growth of a nation depends, therefore, upon the extent of the natural resources and the knowledge of how to use them with as little destruction as possible.

The resources of a country fall naturally into three groups—water, minerals and land—which represent, respectively, resources which are inexhaustible, resources which are exhaustible and cannot be renewed, and resources which are exhaustible but can be renewed. It may be questioned, indeed, whether there is such a thing as an inexhaustible natural resource. Even water, through the denudation of the drainage basins, may become irregular in its flow, or through the careless disposal of refuse may become polluted so that it cannot be ussd. Mines are illustrations of resources which are exhaustible and not renewable. Gas, oil, coal and iron once gone are gone forever.

Of all the natural resources the only one which contains within itself the possibility of infinite renewal is land. The nation should therefore be most vitally concerned with the conservation and improvement of this resource. Human control over such resources as minerals is limited. The only possible means of conservation is the avoidance of waste, but their ultimate exhaustion is unavoidable. With agricultural and forest land, however, it is otherwise. Land can not only be conserved, but constantly improved and its yield increased. While in England the iron ores and the coal are becoming constantly harder to get and their exhaustion is threatened, the agricultural land, after a thousand years of cultivation, is now more productive than ever. The wheat fields of England, under intensive cultivation, yield thirty bushels to the acre, while the virgin fields of America on an average yield less than thirteen.

If a far-sighted national policy in the conservation of natural resources is to make provision for an ever-increasing population, then the greatest possibilities lie in the direction of developing the land in all its forms—field, forest and range—for, notwithstanding all possible economy in the use of non-renewable resources, they are bound to decrease as time goes on.

One hundred years ago the United States east of the Mississippi river was almost unbroken forest, comprising something over 1,000,000 square miles, or about 700,000,000 acres. Now, after about a century of settlement, there are not more than 300,000 square miles of merchantable forest land in the eastern United States. About 330,000 square miles have been cleared for farm land. The remainder has been culled of its valuable timber and devastated by fire or else turned into useless brush land. With the growth of population and the greater demand for agricultural land, the ratio between farm and forest land will change still further. The forests will be more and more crowded into the mountains and upon soils too thin or too poor for agricultural purposes. It may be safely assumed that in 50 or 100 years the proportion of land devoted to the different purposes will change almost as much as it has during the past century. These changes will occur especially in the eastern part of the United States, because there the forest is not confined, as it is in the west, to high altitudes, where agriculture is generally impracticable. In the west the forests, with a few exceptions, as in the low country around Puget Sound, are in the mountains, which rise in the midst of semi-arid plains, and their original area of 150,000 square miles half of which lies in the Sierra Nevada and in the Cascades and half in the Rockies, has changed but very little since settlement. In the west the increase of agricultural land must be secured chiefly through the irrigation of the semi-arid land.

If we take a long look ahead into the future and try to picture to ourselves what will be the ultimate proportion of farm, forest, range and desert in this country 50 years from now, in the light of the increasing demand for agricultural land and of an approximate knowledge of the climatic conditions and the physical properties of the different lands in this country, we shall get something like the condition shown in the diagram.

The area devoted to agriculture in a half century, instead of being 21 per cent. of the total area, as it is now, will be nearer 50 per cent. That this is not an overestimate is indicated by the fact that during the last fifty years the improved farms land of this country has advanced from 113,000,000 acres to 415,000,000 acres, an increase of nearly 370 per cent.

With more intensive methods of cultivation larger yield will undoubtedly be obtained from the same area, yet the area itself under agricultural crops will have to be increased, especially if we are to remain an exporting country.

In Belgium the arable land forms 63 per cent, of the total land area, in Denmark 68, in France 48, and in Germany 47. These countries are not exporters of cereals, although their methods of cultivation are highly developed. France is especially interesting as a criterion, because its methods are most intensive and it is the only country that is self-sustaining; it produces 98 per cent. of all the cereals which it consumes. There is little doubt that our population in the next 50 years, will reach 50,000,000, or about 50 persons per square mile. Whether the acreage of improved farm land will increase at a much faster rate than the population, as has been the case in the past, or whether it will grow at the same or even a slower rate than the population, the future alone can tell; but increase it must.

In mountainous Switzerland only 17 per cent. of the land is cultivated, and in Sweden and Norway, situated in an unfavorable climate and with a scanty population (29 and 18 persons per square mile, respectively), the proportion of arable land is 8.7 per cent. and 1.3 per cent., respectively.

Land chiefly valuable for grazing will form about one-fifth of the extent of the United States proper. This land originally lay west of the one hundredth meridan, in the plains and mountain valleys, but with the advance of dry farming its eastern boundary has been shifted farther west to about the one hundred and third meridian. This land receives but a scanty rainfall and can produce neither forest nor field crop, but supports a vegetation of hardy grasses. It was formerly the natural range of millions of buffalo and is now the grazing ground of herds of cattle and sheep. This land will remain main largely a natural range, since the area which can be irrigated and thus reclaim for agricultural purposes, or which can be used for dry farming, is comparatively small.

According to government estimates, the available water will be sufficient to irrigate 71,000,000 acres, or one acre in 7½ of the whole region. The reclamation service, however, does not expect to reclaim more than five per cent. of all the arid land. This area, together with that used for dry farming, will barely suffice to counterbalance the reduction of the productive area in the United States through the growth of cities, the building of railroads and the general development of commerce and non-agricultural industry. The possibilities for increasing the productiveness of the 300,000,000 acres of our public grazing land are very great.

About two per cent. of the total land area will forever remain desert. There are but few areas within the United States which, on account of the intense heat, very low temperatures, alkali or lack of rainfall, are unfit for the use of man and may be truly considered desert land. Such land is found in the Southwest about the Gulf of California, in Nevada, in Utah and in Oregon in the form of arid basins. Ice-bound deserts are found in Alaska and on the glacier-covered mountain. This land must, so long as the climatic conditions of the country continue as they are, remain unproductive.

The land chiefly valuable for growing forests will shrink to about 360,000,000 acres, less than one-fifth of the extent of the United States proper. Together with the wood lots, which will continue to form part of the farm land, the total forest area will amount to approximately 450,000,000 acres, or a fourth of the total land area.

Will this area be sufficient to provide a population of 150,000,000 peoples with all the timber needed for construction, ties, poles, pulp and all the various uses for which wood seems to be the only suitable material and to protect the soil from erosion, regulate the stream flow and exert its wholesome influence upon the lives of the people?

With the exception of those countries which have naturally a humid climate, like Great Britain or the Netherlands, the countries with a forest area of only 20 per cent. or less show usually to a marked degree bad climatic conditions, with prolonged droughts, frosts and alternating floods and low water, a result of the reduced forest area. Portugal, with a forest area of only 3½ per cent. of the total; Spain, with 16 per cent.; Greece, with 13 per cent.; Turkey, with 20 per cent., and Italy, with 14 per cent., are good examples.

While the area absolutely necessary for the regulation of streams and the protection of soils can be determined only approximately and indirectly, the area necessary to make a country self-sustaining as regards to the production of timber can be found with greater accuracy. If we compare the exports of the different countries with the forest area for every 100 inhabitants we find that countries with 92 acres of more per 100 inhabitants have a surplus of exports over imports, while those with 85 acres or less have a surplus or imports over exports. Apparent exceptions to this rule appear in the cases of Bulgaria and Servia. These countries, while at present importing more wood than they export, possess considerable areas of forest, now inaccessible, and, with the development of means of exploitation and the increased demand for lumber they will in time become exporting countries.

From this we infer that a country in order to be self-sustaining as regards its timber supply must have an area of about 100 acres of forest land for every 100 inhabitants. The area necessary to supply all the wood needed for home consumption will vary of course with the per capita of consumption: and the 100 acres per 100 inhabitants must be considered the minimum area, because it is based upon a moderate per capita consumption such as is found in densely populated countries of Europe, like Germany or France.

The same minimum area for every 100 inhabitants necessary to make a country self-sustaining can also be deduced in another way. At present Germany imports 353,000,000 cubic feet of wood from abroad. To produce this amount of timber Germany would have to possess a forest area of 17,000,000 acres in addition to the 35,000,000 now available. In other words, she would need 52,000,000 acres of forest in order to meet her own timber requirements, or 93.2 acres for every 100 inhabitants. Germany is an extremely good example with which the productivity of the forests of other countries can be compared, because her forests can be taken as a standard of productiveness.

In this country, where the per capita consumption is six times as great as that in Germany or France and the annual growth per acre may be estimated roughly as one-third of that in those countries, the forest area would have to be 1,600 acres for each 100 inhabitants, or more than twice the present area, in order to maintain the present cut. The present area of 775 acres for every 100 inhabitants at the present per capita consumption and annual growth per acre would be sufficient to meet our own needs if there were not a virgin timber, the accumulated capital of centuries, to meet the deficiency. With the exhaustion of this remaining virgin supply, which can last only about 30 years more, there must come a time when not only all our exports of timber must cease, but there will not be enough wood for home consumption.

Even as it is, the total exports of wood from this country amount to only five per cent. of the lumber but, while the surplus of exports over imports is only 18 per cent. —an insignificant amonnt. This shows clearly that we have practically ceased to be an exporting country and the tendency will be more and more toward becoming a wood-importing country.

How shall this shortage be met? With an increasing demand for land for agricultural crops there is little hope of increasing the extent of forest land. As we have seen, the area necessary for this purpose would have to be more than double the present area and this is entirely out of the question. Much of the land now under forest, but capable of producing crops, will have to be cleared and tilled to provide for the increased populations All the evidence, therefore, is that the land under forest will during the next fifty years be reduced to 450,000,000 acres and this reduced area will have to provide for a population almost twice as large as the present. Nor will there be much hope for covering the shortage of our home production by importations from abroad.

The demand for timber is constantly growing all over the world. It increases at the rate of five per cent. annually. If we compare the total excess of imports over exports of all wood-importing countries of Europe with the total excess of exports over imports of all wood-exporting countries we shall find that there is a deficit for Europe of 141,000,000 cubic feet, which is met at present by imports from North America. Sweden, Norway and Austria-Hungary have already touched the highest point in their exports. Russia could probably increase to some extent its exports from the north, where there are still large areas of virgin forest, but the growing scarcity of timber in the other parts of the empire make it very unlikely that larger supplies of timber for export will be available. Canada is still able to increase its exports, but the drain upon the Canadian forests is growing every year and they will remain the only source of supply to satisfy the urgent needs of the rest of the world for coniferous timber after Austria-Hungary and Russia cease to be exporting countries.

The growing demand for wood material must be met, then, not by an increase of the forest land nor by depending on imports from abroad, but by an increase in the productiveness of the forest and a decrease in the waste, to which is due the fact that the United States has the greatest per capita consumption in the world.

Fabian's Cure

By LULU JOHNSON.

Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.

Fabian impatiently paced the piazza. It was 8:10 and the breakfast bell had not sounded. But not because he was hungry did Fabian anathematize the cook.

He had wakened with little appetite, but ever since he had begun to order his life he had had breakfast at 8. It had been the sole recommendation of this boarding place that they had breakfast at his accustomed hour instead of 7:30, as seemed to be the custom in most of the boarding houses in Carrsville.

Because Fabian always took the first two weeks in August as his vacation he followed this custom, too, though the break in the even routine of the office annoyed him. But habit was Fabian's fetich. Habit decreed a two weeks' vacation in August, and so he continued to seek a resort where the orderly routine of his life would be the least interrupted.

This year he had rather fancied Glen farm, but they had breakfast at 7:15. Fabian had inquired irritably why not 7 or 7:30 and had decided in favor of Brook farm, where meals were served at about the hours to which he was accustomed in town, though it annoyed him to have to eat his dinner in the middle of the day and a cold supper at night.

Ever since he had reached his seventeenth year Fabian had been alone in the world and he had fallen in a rut of system. His orderly habit of mind made him a valuable man in the office, but his unwillingness to depart from custom drew few friends, and at twenty-six he was still heart whole.

The delayed breakfast was a far greater annoyance than a more serious disappointment might have been, and he gnawed at his mustache as he strode up and down the piazza. He caught the first jangle as the bell was lifted from the shelf and turned to enter the house, but just then there was a scream from the road, and he turned to see a girl endeavoring to beat off the farm dog, whose muddy paws had already left their imprint upon her dainty skirts.

Something in her pose caught Fabian's fancy, and he went racing down across the grass plot to her rescue, whistling to the dog as he went. But Carlo was determined to make friends with the girl and paid no attention to the calls until Fabian's hand rested heavily upon his collar and the toe of Fabian's boot emphasized lightly the indiscretion of accosting strange young women on the public highway.

CARLO PICKED OUT THE SHORTEST ROUTE TO THE BACK YARD.

"He's a dear old thing," smiled the girl as Carlo picked out the shortest route to the back yard, his tail tucked ingloriously between his legs. "I suppose it is more my fault than his. I walk down to the postoffice every morning, and he always barks his 'Good morning,' but today he seemed to want to shake hands, and he did not realize how dirty his paws were. You won't punish him, please."

"He's not mine to punish," said Fabian absently. He was thinking not of Carlo, but the girl. No woman had ever made strong appeal to him before, but he felt dazed in the presence of this radiant girl with the gentle eyes and the smile that made the whole landscape seem brighter. He was on his knees in the road now, trying to remove the worst of the muddy paw prints with his handkerchief. It was a clumsy effort, for he only made smudges worse, and with a laughing word of thanks the girl stopped him.

"It will be all right when it dries," she said, with her wonderful smile. "You are very kind, but it really does not matter. By the time I get back from the village it will be all right. It's just a little wash skirt anyway, and a trip to the laundry will remove all traces of the dog's impetuosity."

With a nod and another smile she started down the road, and presently Fabian pulled himself together and went in to his delayed breakfast. He sat in a trance through his brief meal and hurried back to the piazza.

After breakfast it was his custom to read the morning paper, but he sat with it in his hand this morning and did not even scan the headlines. He was watching the road for the glint of a white dress, and when it came in sight far down the road he strolled to the gate with an elaborate assumption of carelessness and was leaning against the fence as the girl came up.

The dried mud had been shaken from her dress, and with a smile she called his attention to the fact. "You see it's all right," she declared.

"But I think you need a guard," he declared, with sudden bravery that startled him. "With your permission, I will form an escort to ward off dogs, dragons and other insects."

He fell into step beside her before she could refuse, and they walked briskly on. Fabian wondered if it was possible that she had been going past the farm every morning while he was at breakfast and without his knowledge. It seemed now as though he could feel her presence through stone walls. Never having been in love before, he was swinging the length of Cupid's pendulum, and he exerted himself to be entertaining. So well did he succeed that when he reached the gate of Glen farm, all too soon, Miss Semple agreed to go for a walk in the afternoon.

Fabian went into the house with her that Kerr, whom he had met the year before, might complete the introduction more formally, and even smiled when Kerr introduced him as "the human time table," with a laughing dissertation upon the exactness of his habits.

The rest of Fabian's morning schedule was completely upset, though he returned to Brook farm and there was nothing to interrupt the even tenor of his routine save his thoughts. He could only pace the piazza and think that Marcia Semple was to walk with him that afternoon. The hours dragged interminably, but at last he could with decency present himself, and together they started for the falls.

"How much time have we?" said Marcia as they started out. "Mr. Kerr warned me that you had probably allotted a certain time to our walk and that this must not be exceeded."

"Kerr," said Fabian viciously, "suffers from softening of the brain. We are going to make this walk just as long as we possibly can."

Marcia laughed her rippling laugh that seemed to Fabian the most divine music he had ever heard, but she returned to the subject again when they had reached the falls and were sitting on the mossy bank for a rest.

"Impulse is better than system," she declared. "Now, suppose that you had not followed impulse, but had gone in to breakfast. I should not have known you and should have lost a delightful walk."

"The argument is most potent," he said gravely. "Behold in me a backslider from system."

"Time will tell," she declared. "We shall see."

But time told strongly in Fabian's favor. To hasten the cure he went to an opposite extreme. Instead of the most regular life he led the most erratic existence, aided and abetted by Marcia. The day before his return to town she declared his cure complete.

"You have not done a single thing today at the time you usually do it," she declared as they leaned over the bridge that spanned the tiny stream and let their eyes feast upon the moonlit landscape. "You did not even have dinner."

"Yes, the cure is complete," he said. "I think I rather like doing what I want to do instead of following a well ordered plan. But you have got me into worse trouble."

Marcia did not answer. Her eyes followed the ripple of moonlight across the water, and the hand that rested upon the railing gripped the wood more tightly.

"You should ask what the trouble is," he said after a moment. "Then I should tell you that instead of a schedule the most important thing in life is you. You have lifted me out of my humdrum existence into the new world of love, dear. Is there hope that some day my love will be returned?"

"I think I had better say yes," she said, with a happy little laugh. "It will insure the permanency of the cure."

"And do you love me a little?" he asked humbly.

A soft little hand stole into his. "Dick, dear," she said softly, "why else should I have worked so for your cure?"

How to Speak Correctly.

Say the alphabet aloud, and when you have finished ask yourself if every letter would be perfectly distinct and intelligible to any one who might be listening. Here lies the fundamental principle of all speaking. Every element of every spoken word should be distinct and intelligible. In repeating the alphabet each letter ought to make a perfect escape from the lips of the speaker. Does it make such an escape when you say it? Do you send it out vigorously? Watch yourself as you speak each letter and see what happens to it. If it gives you the sense of hanging about your lips, or if it does not seem absolutely to separate itself from you, or if it drops into your throat, say it again and will it to go boldly out. Try to think of it as being outside yourself as a thing apart. When you succeed in thinking of it in this way, if you don't care for words or if you have never thought about them, you will have taken the first step toward the mastery of good speech. To speak well you must love words and their elements. You must love individual letters.—Harper's Bazar.

Frankness.

"I believe in being absolutely frank with everybody," said the aggressive man.

"Well," answered the peaceable citizen, "I suppose that sort of thing is largely a matter of temperament. If I were as good a hand in a fight as you are, maybe I'd be that way too."—Washington Star.

McHENRY.

A very heavy electric storm passed over this region last Saturday night.

Mrs. Sallie Brenneman and son Ralph made a business trip to Oakland one day last week.

Mrs. Jonas Glotfelty has been on the sick list for some time, but is somewhat improved at this writing.

Mrs. Minnie Hinebaugh and daughter Mary spent a couple days last week at Elmer Weimer's, at Cherry Creek picking blackberries.

Mrs. Lou Lowdermilk and daughter, who have been spending several months at Uniontown, returned home last Friday.

Mr. Jonas Brant made a flying trip to Oakland last Saturday.

We are delighted to learn that Miss Grayce Browning has consented to take charge of our school for the coming year. Miss Grayce is no experiment with us, as she taught here last year and was greatly liked by all.

Miss Elinor Hinebaugh is at Oakland keeping house for her Aunt Marth Robinson, who is ill with tyhoid fever at this writing.

Mrs. Martha Cherry and daughter, of Cumberland, is spending a few days with her sister, Mrs. Mahlon Glotfelty.

Mr. and Mrs. William McLean spent last Sunday with Mrs. McLean's parents.

Miss Esther Hinebaugh, who has been spending several days with her cousin, Mrs. Lou Hoye at Sang Run, returned home last Tuesday.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Specht spent last Sunday with Mrs. Specht's father, Mr. Mahlon Glotfelty.

SANG RUN.

We are having nice weather again after the rain.

Rev. D. H. Friend returned home Friday after spending a week in Friendsville visiting his daughter, Mrs. Custer.

Walter Boyer and family, of Cranesville, spent Sunday at P. W. Grove's.

S. J. Thomas has sold his store to M. H. Dewitt, who has taken possession.

Gilbert R. Enlow was a pleasant caller at the home of Miss Ada DeWitt Saturday evening.

Rev. Vansickle, of Chestnut Avenue, W. Va., preached a very interesting sermon to a large congregation on Saturday evening and Sunday morning.

Misses Mary Friend and Althea Reed were guests of Misses Gladys and Maleta Browning Sunday last.

Miss Mary Browning returned home Tuesday afternoon, after visiting friends in Friendsville for several days.

Mrs. M. Lytle spent several days last week with her parents at Elder.

John F. Friend is preparing to erect a new dwelling house.

R. L. Lowdermilk and Miss Edna Friends, of Hoyes, attended prayer meeting here Sunday evening.

Miss Ora Hoye has returned home after spending the winter and greater part of the summer in New York City.

Miss Sarah Savage, of McHenry, was seen in our village Sunday evening.

The new school house which is being built in this locality, is nearing completion. SNOWFLAKE.

Good Homes Desired.

J. Ed. Kildow, humane officer at Elkins, W. Va., desires to secure good homes for a number of children now in the Children's Home in his city. Ages run from two to 12 years. These children will be placed only in good homes as members of the family, and not as servants. A rigid investigation of the homes applying for children will be made before a child is placed, and only good homes accepted.

Applications must be made upon blanks furnished by Mr. Kildow upon request. Those desiring children should write to Mr. Kildow at Elkins, W. Va.

STOYER.

Our road under the management of Captain White and Jackson Wilson has been improved so that now it is safe to walk or drive over it, even after night.

Chas. Kidd and Waitman Steyer are spending a week at Clarksburg, W. Va. where they said they were going to attend a fair. We think that it would have been nearer the truth had they used the word lady directly after "fair."

Miss Grace Riley called upon some friends in Mountain Lake Park Sunday.

Henry White, who has at some time during the last twenty years been a well known citizen of most every town in the county, recently spent a few days in our community.

Miss Lydia Steyer of Ryan's Glade was visiting relatives in town the first of the week.

Mr. Victor Foley, of Mt. Storm, W. Va., was seen on our streets very early Monday morning—leaving town of course.

A number of our young "sports," who were just crossing Backbone Mountain at the time of the cloudburst Sunday morning, decided that runabouts were not "always just the thing" as some of them have been heard to say a number of times this summer.

Elmer Harvey, of Kearney, was among us Monday.

Miss Ida Harvey was visiting in town Saturday.

P. J. Melvin, our leading merchant, made a business trip to Gorman, Tuesday.

W. T. Steyer spent Sunday and Monday in Deer Park.

There is some talk of the mines at this place starting soon. This sounds good to all. Rest and quietness are fine things when not overdone. But now, since our leading industry has been shut down for almost two years, we can stand a little work and noise.

BITTINGER.

The crop of oats taken off sixty-nine acres of ground on the Jennings Bros. farm, near this village, was threshed recently and produced sixteen hundred bushels of grain.

Messrs. King Brothers, of Somerset county, Pa., were looking at some timber tracts in this section last week, with a view to purchasing.

Mrs. K. A. Bittinger served ice cream to the public on her lawn last Saturday evening.

Mrs. Joel Orendorf is spending this week with her daughter, Mrs. Maust, near Salisbury, Pa.

Mrs. Thomas B. Wiley and son, Master Dewey, attended the Winterburg family reunion at Grantsville last Saturday.

Milton Miller, of Grantsville, was calling on Miss Sarah Bittinger, of this village, last Sunday afternoon.

Joseph Buckle is having his residence improved by the application of a new coat of paint.

Mrs. Turner Lohr and Miss Amelia Beachy spent last Sunday visiting at Fort Hill, Pa.

Mrs. Barbara Lohr, aged about 47 years, died at her home near this village, on Tuesday, Aug. 24th, after a short illness of typhoid fever. This sad and untimely death left a family of ten children orphans, the father having died about three years ago, and the entire community is moved with sympathy for the stricken children. The interment occurred in this village on Thursday morning, Aug. 26th, and was attended by a large number of friends and relatives.

Gregory's Fortune.

By Barry Preston.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

The candles in the thousands of Japanese lanterns which flooded the lawn with their soft light were burning low. Here and there one would sputter uncertainly and then go out, leaving a break in the long lines of various colored illumination.

The orchestra in its palm bordered pavilion played a final selection, after which the musicians put their instruments in the cases with businesslike finality. The crowd which an hour earlier had fairly swarmed the place was now thinning out to a few scattered groups. Already the gayly costumed young ladies at the various booths were beginning to put away their remaining wares, yawning openly as they wearily took account of stock and compared notes on the sales they had made.

The annual bazaar for the Home For Incurables always came to just such a stereotyped, successful ending.

Quite apart from the other loiterers, on a rustic bench beneath a towering maple, Peter Gregory watched the proceedings about him the while he smoked a contemplative cigarette. He had done his duty nobly. He had taken the many booths in order, permitting himself to be swindled at each and making prodigal purchases of useless things, which he promptly gave away.

One booth only he had not visited, and that was the one where, for the amazingly small sum of $1, you could have your horoscope cast, your past read and your future forecast by "Mlle. Nazro, Matchless Egyptian Seer, First Appearance In America." If one were to believe the lurid poster just outside of the flap of the Graham children's lawn tent.

Gregory glanced at the tent in question and puffed somewhat faster at

"YOU HAVE A RIVAL," SAID SHE.

the cigarette, as if he were endeavoring to steel his nerves for an ordeal. For certain reasons he had waited to have his fortune told until the fortune teller should be quite alone. Even as he looked two stout, middle aged women, accompanied by a prosperous looking man, came laughingly out of the tent and made their way toward the street. Behind them Mlle. Nazro stood in the tent's entrance looking across the grounds.

Gregory tossed the cigarette aside, got to his feet and took a long breath. Then he stalked sedately to the fortune teller's booth and removed his hat in a deferential salute.

"Am I too late to consult the future?" he asked.

The young woman before him smiled rather wearily, but with a certain well simulated professional welcome. She was a tall young woman, with a superb figure. Her blue eyes twinkled merrily. Her face was dyed an oriental tint with grease paint, and her lips were very red from the same reason. From beneath the dark wig that covered her head a single lock of blond hair strayed out rebelliously.

"You are rather late," she said, "but perhaps we can manage your future, or at least a part of it, before all the lights go out. Will you please come into the tent? Will you have it by the palm or the cards?" she asked as she seated herself before a small table gay with bright paper and tinsel.

"The cards, if you please. I think them much more reliable," said he gravely as he sat down opposite her.

She produced a deck of cards and pushed them toward him.

"Cut them, if you will," said she.

Gregory split the deck, and the girl turned the cards face up.

"Ah," she murmured as the deuce of hearts was displayed, "you are in love—very much in love?"

"Admitted," said he quickly.

He looked at her with such concentration that her eyes fell, and in her flurry she dropped some of the cards. Gregory picked them up and returned them to the table.

For a moment she manipulated the deck; then she tossed on to the table the jack of diamonds.

"You have a rival," said she, "a big light man. He is very rich." And she laid the ten of diamonds beside the jack.

"Right again," said Gregory. "Mlle. Nazro, your insight or the cards, which ever it is, is positively uncanny. Now tell me more about the lady, please. Does she favor me or my rival?"

There was more manipulating of the deck, mere cutting by Gregory, and the girl looked keenly at a card in her hand.

"Which does she seem to favor?" Gregory asked, leaning forward.

"You," the girl said simply.

With a sudden, swift movement Gregory caught one of the girl's hands in his own, but she drew it away, not without a certain hauteur.

"This is only according to the cards, please remember," she said in a low voice.

"Oh!" said Gregory contritely. "Forgive me. I thought—that is, I hoped"—

"And according to the cards," said the girl hurriedly in a very evident effort to cover her embarrassment, "the lady whom you love is dark."

She pushed the queen of clubs toward him.

For a long time Gregory looked at her steadily. Then a hint of a smile curved the corners of his mouth.

"Of course this is all according to the cards," he suggested.

There was a long pause.

"Not wholly," the girl confessed, her face turned from him.

"To what, then, are we indebted for the rest of it?" he asked.

"Oh, to—to intuition and—and to insight."

Gregory laughed outright. It was a ringing, contagious laugh. He caught up the queen of clubs and sealed her far out on to the lawn.

"Exit the dark lady," he said. "There never was one. The girl I—the girl who is everything to me is not dark," he ended, looking meaningly at the one blond lock that crept from beneath the wig.

The girl arose in some confusion.

"I'm—I'm very much afraid I can't tell you any more about the future," said she. "I think we'd best consider this sitting ended."

"Oh, no, indeed," Gregory declared gleefully. "There's a lot more to be settled yet. That rival, for instance—how about him? What shall we do with him?"

There was a long silence.

"We've got to do something about the rival," Gregory maintained.

The girl picked up the jack of diamonds and the ten spot with it.

"If it's not the dark lady," she said in a very low voice, "the rival doesn't count—neither he nor his riches."

She tore the two cards in pieces and tossed them from her. In an instant Gregory was on his feet.

"Violet!" he cried. "Violet, you mean"—

"It was the cards," she said feebly.

"It was not," he declared flatly, springing to her side.

A half hour later as Gregory was leaving the grounds he encountered Tom Briggs.

"Going to take the car home, Peter?" the latter inquired, with a mystifying chuckle.

"Certainly," said Gregory. "What is there so funny about that?"

"Nothing," said Briggs, with another covert gurgle, "nothing whatever, only, Peter, as an old and trusted friend, I'd advise you to wash that bit of carmine paint off your chin before you go."

Value of an Automaton Face.

"When I first came to New York," confessed a girl art student, "I thought all the women had regular putty faces. It seemed to me I never saw such blank walls of expressionless faces. I would get into a street car and look about me and could not detect any sign that any one else knew I existed. Women looked right through me as if I were a pane of window glass. I soon found out, however, that an expressionless face is a woman's protection. It is not that New York women cannot look bright and interested; it is because they dare not show any friendliness in public. When I first came, being from a smaller city where every one knows every one else, I would get on a car in a lively manner, look about me, smile and study the people, just as I would do at home. I soon saw men returning my friendly looks with disagreeable stares. They naturally thought I was trying to start a flirtation. Several times I was followed as a penalty for my too interested manner, and I began to adopt the New York way. Now I go in many parts of the city acting as near like an automaton as I can, seeing no one, never expressing any interest or emotion in my face, and have learned the secret of going about this big city unmolested."—New York Times.

Poverty and Luxury.

Poverty and luxury—these are the diseases of our industrial regime, to the cure of which the Socialists offer their ineffectual remedy—ineffectual since the population of the United States is made up of 90,000,000 individuals, some of whom will be forever on the verge of bankruptcy, however great their income, and some frugal and always carrying their account on the right side of the balance sheet, however small their annual allotment of wealth.

Poverty and luxury are twin diseases sapping the life of society, the one destroying ambition by withholding sufficient nourishment to the body, the other rendering men worthless to society by a superabundance of the good things of life. Poverty is a disease not indigenous to our American soil. It is a plague brought in by immigrant ships from wornout Europe, and the patients are cured here by the thousands. So long as there remains an uncultivated acre of land anywhere in the Union there is no real cause for poverty nor any excuse for luxury while a foot of land is undeveloped.—J. T. Lincoln in Atlantic.

Quiet.

Patience—Did you have a quiet time up in the country?

Patrice—Oh, yes. You see, auntie's parrot had just died and the phonograph was out of order!

ARBITRATION AS IT WORKED.

He was a man of peace, and he came upon two youths in a back street fighting. Accordingly he pushed through the crowd and persuaded the combatants to desist.

"Let me beg of you, my good fellows," earnestly besought the peacemaker, "to settle your dispute by arbitration. Each of you choose half a dozen friends to arbitrate."

"Hurrah!" yelled the crowd. "Do as the gentleman says, boys."

Having seen the 12 arbitrators selected to the satisfaction of both sides, the man of peace went on his way rejoicing in the thought of having once again prevailed upon brute force to yield to peaceful argument.

Half an hour later he returned that way and was horrified to find the whole street fighting, while in the distance police whistles could be heard blowing and police rushing to the spot from all quarters.

"Good gracious! What is the matter now?" asked the peacemaker of an onlooker.

"Shure, sor," was the reply, "the arbitrators are at work."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Keeping in Practice.

"You are in splendid form," says the leader of the band to the bass drummer. "I must compliment you that after a summer of idleness you have lost none of your technique. Have you practiced all the time?"

"Haven't touched my drumstick since we closed the season."

"But you must have done something to retain your ability unimpaired as you have."

"Well, I put in most of the summer beating carpets."—Judge.

FRIENDSVILLE HAD A SERIOUS FIRE FRIDAY

Long's Hotel at That Place Completely Destroyed.

Last Friday morning about two o'clock the large hotel at Friendsville, owned by Mr. George Long, was destroyed by fire, along with the contents of the building, entailing a loss of nearly ten thousand dollars, upon which an insurance of $7,000 was in effect.

At the time of the fire no one was in the building except the son of the proprietor, the rest of the family being at the farm, about a mile from town, and the origin of the blaze is somewhat mystical.

The structure was a two and a-half story building and was considered an excellent property, having been erected but a few years ago by Mr. John H. Cuppett, and sold later to Mr. Long, the present proprietor, for $9,000 cash. The building contained about twenty-five sleeping apartments, a store room and warehouse and was exceptionally well adapted for hotel purposes.

During the fire the store buildings of Mr. Clarence V. Guard, on one side and Mr. Walter W. Savage, on the other, were threatened with destruction and it was only by hard, concentrated efforts of the town people that saved them from burning.

Married.

HELBIG—BROWNING—In St. Peter's Catholic church, Oakland, yesterday morning at 5.30 o'clock by Rev. James E. Connell, in the presence of the families of the contracting parties, Miss Della Browning, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John T. Browning, of Oakland, and Mr. Edward W. Helbig, son of Mr. and Mrs. John Helbig, also of Oakland. The bride is one of Garrett county's well known young ladies and is quite a favorite. Mr. Helbig is a young man of exceptional qualties and is held in high esteem by the people generally. The best wishes of the friends of the young couple will follow them for a long and successful life. Immediately after the ceremony the couple departed for the east, presumably for Atlantic City, where the honeymoon will be spent.

Has Resigned from Committee.

Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, of Oakland, has tendered his resignation as a member of the local Democratic committee to Gen. Merray Vandiver, Chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee. Mr. Hamill's resignation was accompanied by a letter in which he gave his reasons for his action and in which, it is said, he roundly scored both the head of the Democratic organization of the State and paid his respects to the local leaders.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MR. ELLITHORP

He Writes of Weather Conditions In the Northwest.

To the Editor of The Republican:

In my last letter I stated that the drouth had been broken and now the warm spell has been broken, as there was a heavy frost here this morning, Sept. 1st. At this writing I cannot say whether it was hard enough to injure the corn or not. I hope not, as the crop is very promising, but owing to the severe drouth will be somewhat later than usual.

We were visiting this week in the path of the hail storm of June 24, 1908. I was told by a man at Osterander, a small town on the North Western R.R., and on the county line between Fillmore and More counties, that hail fell that weighed two pounds. It killed birds, jack rabbits, chickens and small animals, beat off roofs that were a little old and the split and slivered siding can be seen on many buildings. It killed all trees in its path. As one travels through the section the groves look as though a fire had burned through them. I was told there was a shingle and window glass famine for a while. Fortunately the stricken district was only a narrow strip, otherwise there would have been suffering.

There has been timothy seed thrashed. It is yielding large and is selling at $2.50 per 100 pounds, or $1.12½ a bushel. A little barley has been thrashed; one farmer reports 40 bushels per acre.

On September 7th, we expect to start for Pine county, the land of fresh fish and venison, where I expect to fish hard as usual. If my success is better than heretofore you may hear from me.

What One Man Raised.

Until the present year, so far as remembrance goes, it was deemed impossible to raise canteloupes is the mountain sections of Garrett county, especially in and near Oakland, but this illusion has been dispelled by an ocular demonstration as witness the display in the window of the real estate office of Mr. E. S. West on Second street, where Rockyford canteloupes, equal in size and as luscious in flavor as those grown at Rockyford, Clorado, the home of this special 'lope, may be seen. Mr. West's patch of canteloupes is not large by any means, but one morning this week he gathered a hundred and stored them away. In addition to this brand of fruit, or vegetable, whichever one may desire to call it, tere is also displayed several specimens of the sugar beet, some weighing as high as six pounds. These beets, in the absence of a sugar refining, are used with great profit for feeding milk cows and other animals. A half acre will produce ten tons of the roots. A stalk of corn, also on exhibition, measures twelve feet and is a splendid speciman of the Iowa corn, in which state the seed was produced.

PEOPLE'S MOVEMENT LAUNCHED BY MR. HAMILL

Disgruntled Party Men Gathered at Court House Tuesday Night.

Of the fourteen districts in Garrett county but three, Nos. 7, 10 and 14, were represented in the much-heralded and widely advertised people's convention held at the court house in Oakland Tuesday night, which assemblage, presumably, was for the purpose of launching a movement for the bettering of political conditions in Garrett county, but, it has been freely predicted, is nothing more nor less than an effort to add strength to the Democratic candidate for chief judge in his fight against Mr. Sloan.

The call was made at the instigation of Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill after a visit to Cumberland last Wednesday afternoon, at which time a conference was held between Mr. Hamill and the friends of Judge Boyd, including some Baltimore and Ohio Railway officials.

At the meeting Tuesday evening the court room was comfortably filled, the majority of the people present being onlookers, the strength of the movement being apparent when a rising vote was taken on a resolution introduced when not more than twenty people voted, including disgruntled Republicans, sore Democrats and four Prohibitionists.

The meeting was called to order by Mr. Hamill who also named the chairman of the convention, Capt. J. W. Cochrane, recently of Cumberland, but now a resident of Loch Lynn Heights. Mr. Hamill in his remarks severely denounced the Republicans and Democrats alike, criticising the ticket already named by the former, and closed his remarks by saying "I am an independent man; I want no office, but I shall be dissatisfied with the ticket to be named by the Democrats when the convention of that party meets on the 18th of the present month." He then introduced a resolution which invited members of both parties to participate in a convention to name a people's ticket on the 23rd inst. Rev. Bolton, of Mountain Lake Park, suggested that the resolution be made to include members of all parties, and the amendment was seconded by one Hiram P. Tasker.

After the resolution had been adopted speeches were made by a number of those present, including Mr. H. A. Hardesty, a pronounced prohibitionist, and also by Mr. W. D. Hoye, both of Deer Park district. Mr. Hoye state that he had never voted for but one Republican in all his life, that man being Mr. E. E. Sollars, and added that after he had done this his conscience burdened him so much that he "promised the Lord if He would forgive him he would never vote for another Republican." A rather remarkable statement from one who is allied with a people's movement to better conditions, is it not? The only inference to be made is that Mr. Hoye proposes to support the Democratic ticket and that he is in the people's movement for the sole purpose of getting an opposition ticket in the field and then deserting it, which may be also the intention of the leaders in the movement.

The resolution adopted calls for a convention to assemble in Oakland on the 23rd inst. to name a ticket, the delegates to the convention to be named at primaries to be held on the 18th inst.

This movement is the result of the dethronement of the Hamill faction by the Democratic State Convention in Baltimore recently. That faction has been extremely sore at the organization ever since and Mr. Hamill's activity in the people's movement is for the purpose of administering a crushing blow against the Browning or regular wing of the Democracy in the county.

Investigating Maryland Roads.

Civil Engineer Blake Taylor spent several days in Garrett county, Maryland, during the past week, studying the extensive road building which is now under way in that section. Mr. Taylor was much pleased with the thorough manner in which the Marylanders are constructing their roads. Our neighbor state is spending five million dollars on the building of state highways, $230,000 of which goes to Garrett county. It is the intention of the Maryland people to build the road to the state line and Mr. Taylor is an enthusiastic advocate of this state taking the matter up and extending the road from the Maryland-West Virginia state line to Parkersburg or some other western point in this state. The matter is certainly worthy the serious discussion of our state legislature.—Elkins Inter-Mountain.

MR. SLOAN'S NOMINATION

Pleases The Garrett County Republican Voters.

Bloomington, Md., Sept., 6th, 1909.

To the Editor of the Republican.

The action of the Garrett delegation to the Judicial Convention which met at Hagerstown last week, in casting the vote of the county for D. Lindley Sloan, thereby giving him the nomination for Chief Judge, cannot be too highly commended.

It is the duty of every party to nominate its strongest candidate for any office, and no mistake was made in selecting Mr. Sloan for the position.

Nothing is to be said against Judge Boyd, who commands the respect and esteem of all classes, but, as under our system of government, it is incumbent upon political parties to name candidates for the judiciary and to fill those positions by popular vote, it then resolves itself into the simple question of each party supporting its own candidate, everything else being equal.

That Mr. Sloan is fully equipped and qualified to fill the place and serve the people upon the bench goes without saying. He is a man of lofty purpose, of clean and unblemished character, without prejudice and free from malice, a lawyer of ability and the possessor of more then ordinary common sense, a quality that will stand him in good stead when he puts on the ermine of the office for which he has been named and to which the people of this Circuit will elevate him at the coming election.

I know it is being said that the judiciary should be divorced from politics, and should be non-partisan in its make up, but this cry has been raised by the Democratic party who should be the last people on earth to give voice to such a sentiment. It is only necessary to remind the people that when Judges Sloan and Stake died that this principle was entirely overlooked and ignored by a Democratic Governor, who promptly appointed two Democrats to fill the positions made vacant by death.

Governor Crothers, since his election, has had several judicial appointments to make, and has he ever appointed anyone, other than a Democrat, to the bench? So it won't do to say anything about a non-partisan judiciary, in the sense intended by those who are trying to gain through this cry.

Mr. Sloan upon the bench will be as free from political bias as any of his predecessors, and as clear of partisanship as his competitor, Judge Boyd, has been. He will dispense justice to all alike, regardless of their politics. He will bring to the discharge of the duties of his office every quality required of a faithful, conscientious and upright judge. It is the duty of every Republican in Garrett county to give him their undivided support.

Very respectfully,
A LINCOLN REPUBLICAN.

THE DEATH RECORD.

JUDGE ELIAS MERRILL.

Judge Elias Merrill, aged 71 years and 11 months, died at his home in Merrill, Garrett county, on Friday, from stomach trouble, after a several weeks illness.

Deceased was one of the best known citizens of Garrett county, where he had lived all his life, having been born and raised there. He was Judge of the Orphan's Court for six years and conducted a general merchandise store at Merrill for n any years.

He was looked up to as a man of sterling worth and ability and his advice was often sought upon various matters by the people of his community.

Judge Merrill is survived by his wife and five children as follows: Messrs. Charles, John and James Merrill, all of Garrett county and Mesdames Chambers DeWitt, of Piedmont and Walter Warnick, of Merrill. Also by two brothers and two sisters, Messrs. David Merrill, of Avilton, Garrett county, and Andrew Merrill, of Winchester, Va., and Mesdames Wesley Broadwater and Henry Broadwater, both of Garrett county.

The funeral, which was one of the largest ever witnessed in Garrett county, took place on Sunday afternoon. Services were conducted at the Merrill residence by Rev. John Green, at 2 o'clock. Mesdames J. T. Dobbie, M. F. Jarboe, and Miss Lizzie Rankin, members of the Lonaconing Presbyterian Church choir were present and sang several hymns during the services. Interment was made in a private cemetery on the Merrill estate.

The pallbearers were: Messrs. Jonas Wampler, Jonas Weitzell, Jacob Strickland, Jesse Robeson, Samuel Broadwater, Daniel Wampler, William H. Green and Jonas Broadwater. The flower bearers, all nephews of deceased were: Messrs. Jesse Merrill, Henry Merrill, Louis Broadwater and Salem Broadwater.—Lonaconing Star.

MR. D. LINDLEY SLOAN'S SUCCESS IS PROPHESIED

The Baltimore American Declares That His Election is Certain.

The Baltimore American of Sunday last in a column dealing with political matters treats thus of the Republican candidate for chief judge in the Fourth Maryland judicial circuit:

According to the present outlook, the Court of Appeals will be balanced by the addition of two Republican judges—Mr. Urner, in the Sixth district, consisting of Frederick and Montgomery counties, and Mr. Sloan in the Fourth circuit, which comprises Garrett, Allegany and Washington counties. They were nominated by the conventions of their respective circuits last week. They can condfiently look forward to their election, and their election will mean a balancing of the Court of Appeals of the state. On that bench there is only one Republican, Judge Schmucker, and, by the way, he is the only Republican state officeholder. There are some Republican clerks in the City Hall, but they were appointed, not elected. Their services are considered so valuable that they have not been discharged by a Democratic administration.

All the signs of the times and recent election figures point to the election of Messrs. Sloan and Urner to the appellate bench.

Times and conditions have changed in Western Maryland since 17 years ago, when Judge A. Hunter Boyd, now chief judge of the Court of Appeals, was elected. He had many factors in his favor which will be missing this year. In fact, he was elected by Republicans. He was elected in 1893 over B. A. Richmond, of Cumberland, by the narrow margin of 183 in a total vote of nearly 20,000. Allegany county gave him a majority of 118. There is no prospect that Judge Boyd will carry Allegany this year. Garrett was a doubtful county in those days. Now it is safely Republican by majorities ranging from 800 to 1000. Washington county was also a close county then. Now it seems to be safely anchored in the Republican column. The late William McKaig, Democrat, was twice elected to Congress in those days, in the Sixth district, of which Garrett, Allegany and Washington counties, which compose the Fourth judicial circuit, form the greater part. In recent years the district has given Republican majorities as high as 4,000.

Mr. Hammond Urner, who has been nominated for chief judge of the Sixth circuit was the Republican candidate for attorney general two years ago. He is an aggressive Republican who stands for the best policies of his party. He is a son of the Hon. Milton G. Urner, who many years ago represented the Sixth district in the National House of Representatives, who was later his party's leader in the Maryland Senate and still later was naval officer of the Port of Baltimore. Mr. Hammond Urner is one of the leaders of the Frederick county bar. When a candidate for attorney general he exposed the evils of the Wilson ballot law and the Democratic plans to make Maryland a one-party state by disfranchising voters. His Democratic opponent is Judge Glenn H. Worthington, who was appointed by Governor Warfield to fill a vacancy caused by the death of Judge McSherry. Mr. Worthington was the author of that disfranchising amendment of which Governor Warfield opposed and which was turned down by the legislature.

The contest between Judge Worthington and Mr. Urner will be close, with the chances favoring Mr. Urner. Montgomery county is admitted to be a Democratic county. It is not admitted, however, that its majority for Judge Worthington will overcome the Republican majority which Frederick county will give Mr. Urner.

Gnagey Family Reunion.

A reunion of the Gnagey family, of which many residents of Garrett county, Md., and Somerset county, Pa., are members, will be held at Riverside Park, on the trolley line between Meyersdale and Garrett, Pa., Thursday, September 23rd, at ten o'clock. A program of merit has been prepared and all relatives and friends of the Gnagey family are invited to be present. Mr. J. S. Gnagey, of near Oakland, has been chosen historian of the family and is now engaged in preparing a paper to be submitted at the gathering.

ROADS 1,800 YEARS OLD

Dr. J. F. Goucher Says They Are Better Than State Thoroughfares

Gratification, but also surprise, was yesterday expressed by Rev. Dr. John F. Goucher, president emeritus of the Woman's College, and Mr. John M. Tucker, chairman of the State Road Commission, when they learned that each had been elected to a prominent office in the Interstate Goods Road Association.

Dr. Goucher was elected president of the new organization, and Mr. Tucker was named on the executive committee. Neither Dr. Goucher nor Mr. Tucker had participated in the conference which preceded the formation of the organization.

"While at Mountain Lake Park on other business," said Dr. Goucher, "I was invited to speak at the banquet of the conference. Being extremely interested in good roads, I rambled on longer than I had intended and spoke rather at length on the subject, but I had not the slightest suspicion that I would be elected to any office in the association. I left the banquet early and did not take any other part in the conferance, so the announcement that I had been chosen to the presidency was a great surprise to me, and I feel highly complimented.

"Good roads," continued Dr. Goucher "mean much to a community, and, living in an age and country of civilization as we do, such roads as we have in Maryland are a disgrace. I have seen roads in Arabia, built by the Romans in the second century, that are even now in much better condition than the streets of Baltimore—and those Roman roads have not been repaired for 1,800 years.

"As far as I can see now, I shall not outline or adopt any 'policy' for my incumbency, but shall first study the constitution and bylaws, to see what we can do in promoting the good roads movement, especially in Maryland and West Virginia. I have been studying the subject of roads in Maryland for a long time, and feel that I know pretty well what is needed, and the association will do its full share toward obtaining the needed improvements.

"The news in The Sun that I had been elected to the executive committee," said Mr. Tucker, "was a great surprise to me, as I had not attended the conference at Mountain Lake Park and had not expected the honor. At the same time however, I am highly appreciative of it.

"As I understand it, the Good Roads Association is formed for the purpose of 'advancing the cause' of good roads, and in this line it can be of great assistance to the commission here in Maryland. It can arouse and maintain interest in the movement and can also work along educational lines, acting besides in an advisory capacity, and offering encouragement in the commission's work. I believe that the association can do a vast amount of good."

HALF A CENTURY PASSED

A Home Visit After a Long Western Absence.

Mrs. Nettie May has for some time been enjoying what can be called a home visit among her friends and relatives at and near Grantsville, Garrett county. Her parents, Perry Shultz and Lydia Glotfelty Shultz, left Grantsville 50 years ago, and located themselves prosperously in St. Louis. Ten years later in the prime of life, he died from cholera. He was elected sheriff of old Allegany county ln 1853. His home for two years as sheriff was in the old jail opposite the present court house. He had the safe custody of Miller, the double murderer of Dr. Hadel and Graft. He received the warrant for the execution of the murderer, but the fatal day came a little after the sheriff's term expired.

Mrs. May, now a widow and a grandmother, has gleaning recollections of this historical occurrence. A few days ago she, with friends, made a visit to Cumberland. She ascended the Court House Hill to view the place where two years of her infant life was passed, but there was nothing to be recognized—the old jail, so-called, was not visible. Recollections both of interest and sadness came and went, but no object was recognizable.

Mrs. May is a lady of fine appearance and address, with cultivations calculated to make and hold friends. She deserves to be called a lady in the full meaning of the gentle term. Her visit, which will end in a week or two, will be remembered for many seasons by those who made her acquaintance, now and before.—Cumberland Times.

WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnificent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of, natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience; America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,000.00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and believe that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator is still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

BALTIMORE, MD.

The Whole World Eager To Hear Cook's Own Story

The report last Thursday that Dr. Frederick Cook has at last discovered the North Pole has caused press and populace alike to unite in unanimous praise for the intrepid American discoverer.

Already plans are on foot to give him on his arrival at Copenhagen aboard the steamer Hans Egede of the Greenland Colonial a reception that for magnitude and fervor will excel anything ever accorded anyone on Danish soil. Nansen, on his return in 1893, was given a royal welcome; but that to be accorded Cook will far eclipse it.

On a boat chartered for the occasion the entire City Council will go out in State to meet the discoverer and will present him a memorial commemerating his achievement.

As he enters the harbor he will have the escort of literally thousands of craft; cannon will boom, whistles blow and bells ring out the glad tidings of his approach to that city.

The King himself in a private audience will extend to him his personal felicitations and the congratulations of the Danish people on his historic exploit.

Following the audience with King Frederick, which will take place immediately upon Dr. Cook's arrival, there will be a banquet, at which men of distinction in every notable walk in life will unite to honor the man who has accomplished a task that has baffled many of the keenest minds and most intrepid souls in the civilized world for the last half century.

Everywhere in the city—on the streets, at the windows, from the top of buildings—the Stars and Stripes are flung to the breeze in compliment to the great American's success. The leading Copenhagen newspapers pay high tributes to the explorer.

At the American Legation Minister Egan has received a constant stream of callers all day long, each eager to congratulate the American people upon the discovery. The local American colony, too, is preparing a series of entertainments for the explorer.

While none of Dr. Frederick A. Cook's friends in the Explorers Club, New York, of which he was was president, doubts that he discovered the North Pole, there is one phase of the matter which those having experience in the Arctic region and with Esquimaux cannot understand. It is this:

The cablegram sent from Lerwick, Shetland Islands, states that Dr. Cook reached the North Pole on April 21, 1908.

The only white man who started with him on the dash to the Pole was Rudolph Franke, but he went with him only as far as Annortok, on the northwest coast of Greenland. Franke was left there by Dr. Cook to guard supplies. He was to stay there a certain time and then start south. Franke got back here in October, 1908, and brought with him the last message received from Dr. Cook.

Franke and Dr. Cook separated on March 3, 1908. On March 17 Dr. Cook wrote Franke a letter, which was carried to him at Annortok by Esquimaux. This letter was written March 17, 1908, from a point just north of Cape Thomas Hubbard.

Cape Thomas Hubbard is 500 miles from the Pole, yet 35 days later, on April 21, 1908, Dr. Cook, according to his cablegram, reach the Pole. A 500 mile journey in the Arctic in 35 days, encumbered with Esquimaux, dogs, slecs and other paraphernalia, is a feat heretofore undreamed of by Arctic explorers. The Esquimaux are notoriously slow travelers. They cannot be made to hurry' according to men who have had experience with them.

To make the 500 miles in 35 days Dr. Cook must have traveled at the rate of nearly 15 miles a day, which is a tremendous rate of speed in the Arctic, according to men who have been there. How he could have kept up such a pace continuously for 35 days they can not understand.

Some members of the Explorers' Club think there must be some mistake in the date given in the cablegram and believe that it was much later when he reached the Pole. If it took him but 35 days to get from Cape Thomas Hubbard to the Pole, they cannot understand why it shou'd have taken more than 16 months for him to get back into touch with civilition.

While Dr. Cook's trip to the Pole has been described as unpremeditated, and the result of a sudden impulse prompted by the Arctic fever which always possessed him, it was as a matter of fact carefully planned. It was not unpremeditated, but it was surreptitious, as no advance information of his purpose was given.

In consequence, the friends of Lieutenant Peary, who is now in the Far North in quest of the Pole, have harshly criticised Dr. Cook for nearly two years. They have charged that he stole a march on Peary when he sailed North in August, 1907, ostensibly as a member of a hunting expedition.

The way Dr. Cook came to go into the Arctic regions on the trip which has seemingly culminated in the discovery of the North Pole was this:

John E. Bradley, a millionaire resident of New York, who has hunted game in all corners of the earth, decided to early in the spring of 1907 to try his luck in the frozen North. He consulted Dr. Cook, and the latter agreed to go with him. In consequence of this agreement Mr. Bradley really became the financial backer of an enterprise which resulted in the discovery of the North Pole, although he little dreamed of such an important eventuality at the time of his first talk with Dr. Cook.

Mr. Bradley bought a 110-ton Gloucester fishing schooner, fitted her with an auxiliary gasoline engine, renamed her the John R. Bradley and late in the spring of 1907 went North in her, with Dr. Cook in command.

When this expedition started out it was announced to be nothing more than a hunting trip along the Greenland coast. All the crew of the vessel so regarded it, and even for nearly a year after the vessel's return from the North without Dr. Cook, it was declared that he had suddenly taken it into his head to try a one-man dash for the Pole and had left the schooner at Annortok for that purpose.

As a matter of fact the schooner was specially fitted out with the supplies which Dr. Cook would need in a dash to the Pole, and was understood between him and Mr. Bradley from almost the outset and that the attempt to reach the Pole would be made. Mr. Bradley admitted this in July, 1908, when he said in a statement:

"I think Dr. Cook has the best possible chance of reaching the North Pole. He has 150 dogs and sleds, which he would have naturally lightened as he got nearer the Pole. Then the idea was for him, after locating the Pole, to make his way back to land as fast as he could, killing the weaker dogs to feed the stronger ones. If he reaches Greenland, he will be almost certain to fall in with Danish whalers.

"When I started to fit out my ship for my shooting excursion I had no idea of making it include a Polar excursion as well, but Dr. Cook, who had been on many Polar expeditions, showed me it would cost only an extra $8000 or $9000, so I thought it was worth trying.

"The crew of my vessel did not know this was one of my objects when we left Gloucester, though the quantity of pennican on board and the many bundles of hickory for sledges caused the captain to suspect."

This clearly shows that before the schooner sailed from Gloucester Dr. Cook fully premeditated the dash for the Pole and had thoroughly equipped himself for the hazardous venture.

The hunting trip was a success. It ended the latter part of August, when the schooner was at Annortok, on the northwest coast of Greenland, about 500 miles from the Pole. Just before the schooner sailed south on August 27, 1907, Dr. Cook announced for the first time to the crew of the vessel that he meant to remain in the North to make a dash for the Pole. He asked for one volunteer to remain with him and join in the attempt. Rudolph Franke, a seaman on the schooner, volunteered and was accepted.

On August 26, the day before the schooner was to start south, the crew worked all day and part of the night unloading the Polar stores brought along for Dr. Cook. On August 27 the schooner sailed at noon for New York.

The first week was spent by Dr. Cook and Franke in building a house aided by the Esquimaux By the middle of September they had comfortable quarters built and then proceeded to lay in a stock of meat to last them through the long winter. The whole of the next month was devoted by Dr. Cook and Franke to hunting. At the beginning of the long Arctic night the temperature was between 30 and 40 degrees below zero.

Notwithstanding the intense cold the ice was not always firm, according to Franke, and traveling was dangerous, especially in the morning and evening. Dr. Cook and Franke found a new way to prepare dog food. Franke refused to disclose this secret, but said that Dr. Cook counted upon it giving him a big advantage over other explorers. Furs, clothing such as the Equimaux use, and harness for the dogs were purchased by Dr. Cook on trips he made at great risk and personal danger to Inglefield Gulf and North Star Bay.

The house they lived in during the winter of 1907-08 was built of boxes and consisted of one room, 12 feet square. In this room was done the carpentering, meat curing, baking, cooking, living and sleeping. It was also the reception hall for visiting Esquimaux.

Finally, on February 26, the start for the Pole was begun. At that time it was Dr. Cook's plan to take Franke with him all the way.

Ever since his first trip to the Arctic Dr. Cook had declared that the only way to reach the Pole was to make a start in the height of the Arctic winter, and thus get the advantage of a continuous ice passage. He also declared that compressed or tabloid foods were useless—that the only way to do was to live as the Esquimaux do and eat their food. He had no faith whatever in balloons or other modern schemes for reaching the Pole contending that the only effective method was by walking and hard work.

For years his fellow-members of the Explorers' Club were made familiar with his ideas on the subject. He declared it was useless to attempt to reach the Pole with several white men in the party; that the fewer the white men the better the chances of success.

That he had faith in his own convictions was shown when he asked only for a single volunteer from the crew of Mr. Bradley's schooner. And he proved it again when he started on the perilous journey with Franke as his sole white companion.

It was noon of February 26 when the start north was made. The first night was spent in three snowhouses on an an ice floe in Kahe's basin. The next day, February 27, the sun appeared for the first time in 140 days. Cape Sabine was reached late that evening and the next day the party was stormbound. The next March brought the party to Rice Strait, 10 miles northwest of Greely's memorable winter quarters of 1883-84. Finally Flagler bay was reached. There the rigors of the march exhausted Franke, and on March 3, 1908, Dr. Cook, not wishing to be encumbered with a sick man, ordered him back to Annortok to watch the supplies.

Franke went South to Annortok and Dr. Cook went North. More than a month later Franke, at Annortok, received a letter from Dr. Cook dated "March 17. The Polar sea, north of C. Hubbard," This letter said:

Dear Rudolph—Thus far it has gone very well, but the weather has been awful cold. We got no musk ox until we crossed Ellsmere Land, but since we have secured 102 musk ox, five bears and about 150 haers.

The Esquimaux will probably return slowly, for they like this land very well. I did not expect them to reach you until about the middle of May. If we are lucky we will take a short cut back and get to Annortok by the end of May.

When the natives get back give them all one block of tobacco and nothing more till I get back, except those who go away. Picodlima and Egingwah will go away. Give them a knife and a hatchet each and anything else which we can spare that they want. If you get a chance send to Igloodohoming and also to the Island of North Star a box of biscuit and a can of alcohol.

To the present we have seen nothing of Crookerland, and I am taking a straight course for the pole. The boys are doing well, and I have plenty of dogs. I hope to succeed. At any rate, I will make a desperate attempt.

While I expect to get back to you by the end of May, still I wish you to be ready to go to Acponie, the island off North Star, where the whalers' steamers come, by June 15, and if I am not back go home with the whalers. I think, however, we will be back.

Gather all the blue fox skins you can. These must be our money on the return trip. If you can get a few bear skins, take them, also norwhal and walrus tusks, but do not give too much for them.

The dogs that come back that belongs to us turn over to Ponicpa to feed and work. If Kudnu (the Dane) is still there, urge him to wait for our return either at Annortok or at North Star, for I am anxious to go to Upernivik at once on our return, and he can be of much use to us.

There is likely to be much open water between you and Etah, so you had better send the trunk with norwhal tusks and all things for the return to Etah at least, if not farther, as soon as you can.

I have regretted many time that you are not with us, but at the moment it seemed to best to send you back, and, on the whole, you are more assistance to me at the house to guard and care for our things than here in the field in this awful cold and wind. I trust you are of the same opinion. So goodbye, and now to the pole. Yours cordially,

FREDERICK A. COOK.

When Franke got back to New York in October, 1908, and brought this letter with him he also brought a sealed letter from Dr. Cook to his wife. The contents of this letter Mrs. Cook would never reveal.

Dr. Cook, while in winter quarters at Annortok with Franke, wrote his wife a letter on December 6, 1907. This letter was in part, as follows:

I have this opportunity to send a letter to Upernavik by Ramussen during this month, and I must hasten to report our progress to the present. I have 100 dogs, and as many more as I desire, with 15 of the men of the tribe assembled here for the attack over the new route accross Ellsmere Land, out by way of Nansen sound and back by Kennedy channel (the channel between Greenland and Ellsmere Land), thus using to good advantage the drift and the musk oxen, so abundant in Ellsmere Land.

All of my equipment is ready, and we hope to start for the goal late in January. With men and dogs well fed and under normal conditions, like my predecessors, I feel confident, as our equipment means, perfection. When we return we will push southward at once to Cape York and Upernavik.

The first news that the members of the Explorers' Club received of Cook's determination to make a dash for the pole reached them in the fall of 1907 in a letter from the explorer himself. This letter was written at Annortok on August 26, 1908, the day before the Bradley party sailed south, and was as follows:

I find I have a good opportunity to try for the pole, and therefore I will stay here for a year. I hope to get to the Explorers' Club in September, 1908, with the record of the pole. I plan to cross Ellsmere Land and reach the Polar sea by Nansen strait. I hope you can induce some of the members of the Club to come and meet me at Cape York. Here's for the pole with the flag.

At the time Rudolph Franke came back here in October, 1908, with the last news from Dr. Cook, Anthony Fiala, a friend of the Brooklyn explorer and who headed the William Ziegler expedition to find the Pole, said:

"This letter of March 17, 1908, from Dr. Cook places him on the Polar ice north of Cape Hubbard and on his way to the Pole. If Crocker Land is where it is supposed to be and turns out to be a chain of islands, as has been suggested, than Dr. Cook will have the advantage of a high northern base and next summer we may receive the news of his successful reaching of the Pole.

"Dr. Cook's march from Etah to Cape Hubbard, across Ellsmere Land and up to Nansen strait in 14 days was a splendid achievement in itself."

Two months ago the members of the Explorers' Club satisfied themselves that Dr. Cook had found the Pole. They worked out this conclusion with charts and deduction and taking into consideration his long absence.

Notwithstanding the confidence, the members of the Club raised a fund to finance a relief expedition. Two weeks ago the auxiliary schooner Jeanie sailed from St. John's, Newfonndland, bound for Etah, Greenland, which is 20 miles south or Annortok. The Jeanie will arrive there the middle of the month and will probably remain North all winter in ignorance of the return of Dr. Cook.

A PROTEST FILED AGAINST HIS APPOINTMENT

Ministerial Association Asks Census Bureau to Hold Up Mr. Stump.

The Cumberland Ministerial Association has filed with the office of the director of the census in Washington a protest against the proposed appointment of Mr. John J. Stump, of Cumberland, as supervisor of the census for the district in Maryland embraced in the Sixth congressional district, namely the counties of Garrett, Allegany, Washington, Frederick and Montgomery. The association met this week and passed on a protest which was carried to Washington by one of the members of the association and filed Wednesday.

Mr. Stump, it is understood, has been recommended by Congressman Pearre for the appointment. Mr. Stump has always been close to Mr. Pearre and among the Congressman's leading lieutenants in his bitter factional fights in Allegany county. The proposed appointment is in recognition of faithful political service. Mr. Stump is a wholesale and retail liquor dealer in Cumberland, trading under the name of John J. Stump & Co. The protest is accompanied by copies of eight or ten advertisements which have been published by Mr. Stump in the furtherance of his business The protest is as follows:

"Cumberland, Md., August 30, 1909.

"Hon. E. Dana Durand,

"Director of the Census,

"Washington, D. C.

"Dear Sir:—The Ministerial Association of Cumberland, Md., being informed through the medium of the public press that the name of John J. Stump of this city is being considered for appointment as census supervisor for the counties comprising the Sixth Congressional district of Maryland, namely the counties of Garrett, Allegany, Washington, Montgomery and Frederick, respectfully beg leave to file this protest against the proposed appointment of Mr. Stump to this important and responsible position, urging as the basis of our objection the character of the business in which he is now and for many years past has been engaged.

"We desire particularly to call your attention to the character of certain advertising matter habitually circulated by Mr. Stump in the conduct of his business, specimens of which are hereto appended. In one of these advertisements he publicly urges on railroad men the use of whisky. Considering the hazardous nature of railroad employment we consider the character of this advertisemunt especlally censurable. We also respectfully call your attention to the annexed copy of the advertisement published in the West Virginia Argus of Kingwood, W. Va., in which he brings his wares to the attention of people living in territory where the sale of liquor is prohibited by law.

"In view of the above facts and bearing in mind the statement of President Taft in his letter outlining the duties of census supervisors in which the President says, "the supervisors are given complete discretion in the selection of the enumerators under them," we would not consider the proposed appointment a proper one. Our protest against the appointment is in nowise due to any desire to interfere in any way, matter or form with a political matter, but is based on two grounds alone, first, the character of the business of the proposed appointee; and second, the character of the advertising matter circulated by the proposed appointee, which is certainly susceptible of just criticism."

The advertisement first referred to is a display and reads: "Railroad men should keep a bottle of good whisky at home. Get the best at Stump & Co., 22 Bedford street." It is understood the advertisement was taken from a railroad men's picnic program.

The officers of the Cumberland Ministerial Association are: President, Rev. William Cleveland Hicks, rector of Emanuel Episcopal church, vice president, Rev. Dr. James E. Moffatt, of the First Presbyterian church; secretary, Edgar W. Pierce, St. John's Lutheran church; treasurer, J. William McCauley, St. Paul's Lutheran church.

It is stated that similar protests will be filed by ministers of Oakland, Hogerstown, Frederick and Rockville.

District Primaries A Failure.

The following letter from Mr. B. A. Richmond was published in the New York Sun August 27th. His views throw light on the situations here and gladly given space in our columns:

In the discussion of the direct primary it may not be uninterested to your readers to be informed of our experience in a Maryland county under a direct primary law in action. In this State all primaries by a recent law are now regulated by a long, minute and intricate statute, entailing enormous labor upon the election officials and great cost and expense to the county and candidates. Under this law any citizen who shall make application by a certain day, pay his share of the expense and is otherwise eligible can compel the supervisors to place his name upon the official ballot.

In practical operation the primary of each party, four weeks before the date of voting assumes all the objectionable characteristics of a regular election. Combinations and bargains, intrigue and trading, crimination and recrimination, newspaper charges and counter charges, and a regular flood of the usual hand bills, mark the closing days of the contest, with all the consequent bad feeling, interruption of business and disturbance of the peace of the community.

At a primary held here last week for the nomination of county officers fifty-seven persons offered themselves as candidates, and the result to a large majority of the members of that party, not professionally interested as politicians, was distinctly disappointing. Perhaps no scheme born of such alluring promises of reform ever proved so illusory. Some of the particulars in which the law in actual practice signally failed are as follows:

1. It was claimed that by a direct vote of the people a better class of men would be selected for the various offices than by the convention system. Just the contrary turned out to be the fact. As any man under the new system could force his name on the ballot by a mere compliance with the law a large number without regard to fitness crowded forward as candidates. This, of course, deterred better men who would have accepted a nomination from a convention from entering the unseemly scramble. The voter, being confined to a selection from among the names on the ballot (since independent voting is practically useless) was reduced to a mere choice between exils. The quality of the ticket nominated was thus entirely regulated by the selfish ambition the vanity or the effrontery of the candidates themselves, and not by their fitness at all. Net result, the selection, with a few exceptions of an inferior ticket, with better men left out of the running.

2. It as claimed for the new primary that it would at least enable the majority of the voters to express their will, whether the candidates selected should be the best who could be had or not. This proved to be a delusion. So many candidates crowded upon the ballot that some of those securing even a small minority were nominated. Thus in this county candidates receiving less than one-fourth of the total votes cast were actually nominated, although more than three-fourths of their fellow party men rejected them and preferred other persons.

3. It was confidently claimed that if the new primary did nothing else it must surely deliver the people from the domination of the party leaders or so-called bosses, but this proved to be the most amusing chimera of all. The party leaders by a tip to their favorites made sure that their names should be snugly on the ballot along with the rest, and then by quietly rallying their political henchmen throughout the county to the support of these particular favorites they were all forced to the front, and by thus receiving the largest minority vote the slate went through to a man. It was the simplest and easiest thing ever seen: not half as much trouble and bother to the leaders as managing a convention.

4. The bosses thereby escaped all responsibility for the nomination. If some of them are bad, did not the people make them? Why, what would you? The people cried for a direct primary and they got it. Then how can they blame the bosses if the scheme did not work out to suit them? Thus the bosses quietly made the whole ticket, while the people fondly thought they were choosing their nominees in defiance of the bosses. O tempora! It is to laugh. It makes one believe that Lincoln's talk about not being able to fool all the people all the the time was only one of his jokes after all.

These are but few of the particulars in which the direct primary has utterly failed to improve upon the convention system, but I need not name the rest.

It is sufficient to say that the plan in actual practice here has not accomplished a single reform so confidently claimed for it by its sponsors. Perhaps no one political panacea ever yet hatched in the cloistery brain of the sciolist or evolved from the a priori logic of the academician has proven in actual practice such a snare and a delusion as the direct primary.

In view of the encouragement the advocates of this system are receiving in certain quarters in your own State of New York, the wisdom of Solomon surely must have been at fault when he said, "In vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird."

EX-GOV. BROWN HAS A BOMB FOR DEMOCRATS

Predicted That He Will Bolt Party's Ticket—Scoffs at Leaders.

Ex-Governor Frank Brown promises to burst a political bombshell some time between now and election day, says the Baltimore Star. Just what will be the nature of the explosion is not known, and the ex-governor will not say himself. Consequently his friends are sitting back and waiting for something to happen.

Not a few predicted that he will bolt the Democratic ticket, while those close to the governor recall the fact that, not a week ago, he went on record as saying that the Republican platform held out greater promise for increased representation for Baltimore than the Democratic platform.

The former Governor prefers to keep his friends and enemies guessing as to what course he will pursue in the coming election, and he just sits in his office in the Baltimore City Hall and chuckling to himself. But he is thinking just the same, although he isn't saying a word.

"I am just laying low," remarked the city collector, "but first thing somebody knows something is going to drop. I will have a good many things so say between now and election day which will certainly make some of the wise fellows stand up and take their hats off to me. Don't ask me what I have up my sleeve now. Nobody will know now, but they certainly will know before November. When I get started in a political campaign I never know when to stop. I do not want to wake up too soon, for it might give the other fellows an opportunity to get busy and return my fire. But you just say for me that I am going to have some pretty spicy things to say on certain things before the election.

"And what about the Democratic leaders—will you pay your respects to them?" he was asked.

"Leaders," was the retort of the ex-Governor, "why who told those fellows they were leaders? They can't lead anybody. They may have their own opinions about leadership, but the other fellow has his, too. They can't prevent us from having it. But never mind. Just be quiet; things will be waking up pretty soon, and then I am going to have my say."

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc.

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. Address Dr. Percival Lantz, Alaska, W. Va. 7-tf

AS THE FOREIGN-BORN SEE IT.

One of the effects of the proposed suffrage amendment will be an unusually heavy registration of the foreign-born element. This factor in the city's voting population is thoroughly organized in order to make every vote tell against the measure that would cause inroads upon the voters of this class and debar others, for despite all the ingenuity they can bring to bear and the denunciation in their platform of the declaration that the amendment would prove a trammel on the foreign-born voter, the fact remains patent that this is the case. The immediate effect will be the enrollment of every foreign-born citizen on the registration list, thus insuring an unusually heavy poll of ballots of this voting section. As they will all be adverse to the amendment, the effect upon the chances of the Democrats in this city is likely to prove disastrous; certainly, their pet measure will be torn to tatters.

Incidentally, the projection of this nauseous issue into the campaign will prove beneficial, as it will incite the patriotic interest of the new citizens in the politics of the city and state; the propaganda against the amendment will have distinct educational value and result in the dissemination generally of beneficial information as to the political institutions and methods of Maryland that will tend to align the foreign-born voter steadfastly to the Republican party, as the party that stands nationally and in the state for the factors of progress.

It will be useless for the Democrats to deny the evident effect of their amendment, and their declaration that they have no intention to make it work hardship to the foreign-born voter will not swerve any such from steadfast opposition to it. These voters are not under the influence of race prejudice; and, indeed, they resent anything of this nature. Many of them have come from countries where Bourbonism in its logical outcome has created political tyranny of the harshest kind, and they have no sympathy for an endeavor to crush the political rights of any body of voters because of race considerations. They have been attracted to this land through the freedom of American political institutions; they will certainly not now seek to shackle any set of the community. Yet, when the danger comes to their own door and they see that their newly acquired rights are hazarded, they will throw all their strength into the effort to defeat the political plotters.

The holding of mass-meetings and the dissemination of literature will bring the fact to the knowledge of the foreign-born voters, and they will not need much urging to strike a blow at the defamation of the sacred rights of the franchise. No amount of chicanery or duplicity will hoodwink them. They are alive, thoroughly alive, and will be heard from with a unanimity that will be even more remarkable than their support of the movement to kill the Poe amendment. Many of them belong to a race that little more than three-quarters of a century ago was deprived of political rights in Maryland, the securing of which marked the casting down of the last bar to the perfect freedom of Maryland's political opportunities as compared with those of the advanced states.

The foreign-born voters know that no country has progressed in its political breadth that undertook to hamper the voting privilege with race restrictions. They understand full well that the chief glory of this country is its freedom from such curtailments, and they will not be party to an effort to place their adopted state in the unenviable position of fettering the franchise and robbing an element of the voters of their rights. They see that the process might very well be carried farther. They fear its immediate effect on themselves. The soft words of the Democratic spellbinders will be without effect.—Baltimore American.

HOYES.

Again the whistle of the steam thrashing machine is heard first at one farm and then another.

Messrs. Wm. Bowman and Gilbert Enlow are kept quite busy doing the thrashing in this community.

Within the past two weeks we have experienced several of the heaviest rain falls within a number of years. So far no damage was done to the crops here.

Mrs. Carson and daughter, of Pittsburg, who have been guests at M. Mattingly's for the past week, returned to their home last Monday.

On account of the inclement weather, there were no services in the M. E. church Sunday morning, however, Rev. Wolfe was at his post of duty.

Troy Glover and wife entertained a number of their relatives at their home Sunday. Among them were Allan Glover and daughter, Clyde Glover, wife and child.

Miss Bertha DeWitt, accompanied by her guest Miss Minnie Boroff, of Dayton, Ohio, Misses Sadie and Sudie Friend were visiting at the home of W. A. Smith's last Sunday.

Mr. McLelland, traveling salesman for Lindsay Hardware Company of Pittsburg, spent several days the past week in Hoyes with his lady friend, Miss Bessie Carson.

Miss Vinnie Kamp and Beason Glotfelty took supper and spent the evening with Miss Freda DeWitt last Sunday.

Misses Della Savage and Auburn Smith, who took in several days of Chautauqua and visited relatives and friends in Oakland, Mt. Lake Park and Deer Park last weeks have returned to their home.

Miss Sudie Friend left Hoyes Monday afternoon for Mt. Lake Park, where she will visit relatives the coming week.

W. A. Smith, one of the representatives to the Judicial convention at Hagerstown, left this place for that city where he will spent several days.

Arthur Custer and sister were calling on their sister, Mrs. Ravenscroft, at Accident one afternoon the past week.

Prof. A. W. DeWitt arrived in our town this week and will visit his brothers for a short time.

Rev. H. E. Friend assisted by quite a numbers of his neighbors, raised a fine large barn on his farm last Tuesday. The ladies of the family were also assisted by several of their neighbor ladies to serve two most sumptuous meals to all.

Misses Bertha Custer and Icie Friend attended the closing day of Chautauqua at Mt. Lake Park last Wednesday.

Misses Sadie Wilburn and Della Savage were out horseback riding Saturday evening, which they both enjoyed immensely, and according to the velocity with which they traveled we think they exceeded the speed limit, and undoubtedly the horses were tired enough had they been "Broncho Ponies" to unload by "bucking."

The members of the Epworth League are contemplating a box supper in the near future for the purpose of raising funds to purchase an organ for the church, which is badly needed.

McHENRY.

McHenry is booming.

The hack from Rocky Point made a flying trip to the Sang Run cave last Sunday. We see they have made a raise of two horses and fly nets.

Mr. T. C. Hinebaugh made a business trip to Oakland one day last week.

Mr. T. Browning and son, Charles, were seen passing through our town last Sunday.

Messrs. Ralph Brenneman and Murray Stark were calling on Mr. Floyd Fear one day last week.

Mrs Mahlon Glotfelty spent last Sunday at the home of Mrs. Arch Glotfelty.

Miss Florence Edwards spent last Saturday and Sunday at the home of Mrs. Geo. Glotfelty.

Miss Esther Hinebaugh was a pleasant caller on Miss Sarah Savage one day last week.

Quite a number of our young ladies were out horseback riding one day last week.

Mrs. Lou Lowdermilk and daughters, Mary, Anna and Georgia, spent a day last week at the home of J. M. Lowdermilk at Hoyes.

Several automobiles were seen flytng through our town last Sunday. We are sorry to say they were not from Sang Run.

Mr. Claude Lowdermilk and sisters, Mary and Anna, were at Hoyes Sunday afternoon.

Mrs. Minnie Hinebaugh has quite a number of city boarders at this writing.

Mr. Jonas Glotfelty, Jr., spent last week with his grandfather.

If you hear from us no more, remember we are still here.

TROUBLES OF LOCAL DEMOCRATS NOT LESSENED

Mr. Hamill Threatened to Fly Off at a Tangent.

The Baltimore American of last Saturday contained the following interesting bit of political news:

Troubles for the Democrats in several counties were echoed yesterday at the meeting of the New Democratic State Central Committee, which met at the Eutaw House on Thursday.

These troubles were threshed over yesterday by Democrats who lingered in the city after the meeting of the state committee. They found but little to solace them in the situation in several counties. Garrett county seemed to be the storm center of Democratic apprehensions. This was a safe and sure Democratic county in years gone by, but during the last quarter of a century there has been an influx of people into the county who have developed its resources and who in their labors have been greatly aided by the Republican tariff. The result has been that the county, appreciating the benefits of Republican principles, has switched to a safe Republican county. In this switching the Republicans have been aided, especially during the current year, by factional fights among the Democrats.

The Democratic situation has not been improved by the appointment of Mr. Moses R. Hamill as the third member of the state central committee of the county. This appointment was made by Chairman Murray Vandiver, of the state central committee, in conformity with the recommendation of the committee on credentials of the recent state convention.

The appointment of Mr. Hamill has created an awful rumpus in Democratic politics in Garrett county. Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, Jr., does not hesitate to say that he will not stand for the appointment, which places the Browning faction in control in the county.

Hence more lively and interesting times in Garrett.

Mr. G. Semmes Hamill, Jr., favored the appointment of Mr. Porter, a cousin of Governor Crothers, as the third member of the committee, but in this recommendation he was left in the cold.

Mr. Moses R. Hamill, who has been appointed by General Vandiver as the third member of the county committee, is progressive and is an ex-member of the School Board and one of the strongest supporters of the Browning faction in the county. This gives the Brownings control of the regular party organization. This faction is in full accord with the state organization in all interests affecting the policy of the party. They now state they will proceed to nominate a regular Democratic ticket according to the primary call, as applications have been filed by candidates for delegates to the convention in nine of the fourteen districts of the county.

LEG AMPUTATED.

Mr. William C. Wilderson, Aged 75, Underwent Serious Operation.

Yesterday afternoon Dr. Henry W. McComas and Dr. J. E. Legge went to the William C. Wilderson homestead over in District No. 8, this county, where they amputated Mr. Wilderson's left leg below the knee.

For a long time past Mr. Wilderson had been a great sufferer from an injury he received and which eventually produced a gangrenous condition of the member, and in order to at least prolong his life, the operation was necessary, which was successfully accomplished, notwithstanding the extreme age of the patient, he being 75 years old, and in a weakened state on account of his long illness. Every hope is entered for his ultimate recovery.

SANG RUN.

Mrs. J. C. Hoffman and littte daughter, of Accident, are visiting at N. C. Browning's this week.

Claude Lowdermilk and sisters, Mary and Anna, of McHenry, attended church here Sunday.

Miss Florence Edwards spent Saturday evening and Sunday at McHenry.

J. Frank Browning has gone to Swallow Falls, where he is employed by G. D. Browning.

Andrew Shartzer was in this section Monday buying cattle.

J. Alvin Friend and family spent Sunday at P. W. Groves'.

Alvin Englehart, of Accident, called on Miss Josephine Browning last Saturday evening.

Paul S. Hoye was a pleasant caller at N. C. Browning's Saturday evening.

Farm for Sale.

I offer my farm in District No. 4 for sale. It contains 172 acres, one-third under fence and about forty acres cleared. About 250 bearing apple trees and 10 pear trees are on the place. Well watered and is two and a-half miles from the B. & O. R. R. About 200,000 feet of oak timber and 1,000 ties may be cut from the woodland. Terms will be made to suit purchaser.

IN MEMORIAM.

The following poem is composed in memory of our only and departed sister, Mrs. Barbara E. Bender-Lohr by her youngest brother, and is affectionately dedicated to her ten surviving orphan children, to our aged and venerable father, and to my seven older brothers.

It was on an autum afternoon,
Down among the West Virginia hills,
Woeful message came to me, so soon,
O're the mountain peaks and rushing rills.

I could hear the crickets chirping
As the message read of death to me;
On the distant upland residing,
That bereaved home I then could see.

Death had come and snatched the heart from home,
Left ten orphan children, thus to mourn—
Mother's loss they scarcely can condone;
Cruel Death! thou makest home forlorn;

Mother's voice, they never more can hear,
It is still, and never more will speak
Gentle words so sweet to human ear,—
Words of life with love and truth replete.

Never more in times of direst pain,
Will the music of that soothing voice
Lull the weary head to ease again
Gently bid the fainting heart rejoice.

Oft thy heart was troubled, heavy, sad;
Yet thy patient hands kept toiling on,
So thy darling children might be glad—
Mother, dear, they miss thee, thou art gone

Lonely orphans gather round the hearth,
But the embers on the hearth burn low;
Still, the voice of evening song song and mirth:
Breezes moan thru trees in sunset glow.

Mother, now thy days on earth are over,
Now, thou hast a home not made of clay,
Now, no more the shadows of evening
Steal across the sky and clouds the day.

Worthy mother, true and meek and fair,
Richest gift, thou, and noblest pleasure,
Like the precious pearl and diamond rare,
Art to home the costliest treasure.

Healing balm for every sorrow,
Smiles for trouble, soothing tears for pain,
Economic but never narrow,
Thinking more of love than much of gain.

Dearest friend to man in all the earth,
Sung by poets, revered by ages,
Who can calculate thy truest worth?
Not one among ten million sages.

Ah, my heart grows sad, as looking back
To the time of childhood's joyous days,
I reflect how sister rested not,
While at will I could engage in plays.

Alas! alas! how dreary the night,
And how sad the thought to you and me,
Since in yonder grave, and out of sight,
We have placed our love at rest to be.

But beyond this sad and tearful land,
Where there is no night, but all is fair,
We may truly know each noble hand
Now the palms of victory shall bear.

Where the crystal streams thru endless time,
Ever flow o're countless golden sands,
Where humanity shall meet, in fine,
We again shall clasp our loved one's hands.

GIVE THEM A START

The New Year is rapidly approaching. This would be a good time for you to start your young folks on the road to Success.

Early training in the practice of self-denial; instruction as to the use and value of money; opportunities for earning and saving money; all these tend to fix and fasten the children in the ways of thrift and prosperity.

We most gladly assist the young people in getting started.

TOT OF EIGHT YEARS KILLED BY WHISKEY

Son of Mr. and Mrs. John W McCullough at Friendsville. Drinks Poison

Last Sunday afternoon about three o'clock John W. McCullough, aged eight years, son of Mr. and Mrs. John W. McCullough, of Friendsville, found a pint bottle of whiskey in his father's barn at the above town and not knowing what was contained in the flask drank the entire contents, his death resulting Monday evening about nine o'clock, the child not having regained consciousness from the time he was found lying in the barn until his death ensued thirty hours afterwards.

While it has not been definitely determined by the physicians attending the child, it is thought by some at Friendsville that the whiskey contained a drug, while others are of the opinion that the great amount of liquid taken by the child would itself produce paralysis and ended with the demise of the little one.

Mr. and Mrs. McCullough are nearly heart broken over the death of the little boy. He was an extremely bright and interesting child. His funeral took place Tuesday and was largely attended by many sympathetic relatives and friends.

Messrs. E. S. West and John Felty, Jr., returned to Oakland yesterday from the vicinity of Parsons, W. Va., where they went on business connected with the sale of a large body of real estate.

Rev. C. E. Guthrie and family, of Washington, D. C., were the guests of their uncle Rev. H. H. Knight, on Tuesday, returning from a brief visit to Mt. Lake Park. Rev. and Mrs. Guthrie have recently lost their eldest son, Freedom Cowan Guthrie, aged sixteen years, by appendicitis.—Piedmont Herald.

Mr. Leonard Lochner, of Lonaconing, who held the position of foreman in this office until the early months of the present year and who since that time been at his home, returned to Oakland last Thursday afternoon by way of Grantsville and the Accident road, resumed his position in this office Friday morning last.

The Methodist Episcopal Conference of West Virginia will open at Mannington on September 29. There will be 300 or more delegates there from various sections of West Virginia, and the meetings will last for a week or more. The conference will be presided over by Bishop Luther Wilson of Cincinnati. The meeting of the laymen of the conference will open on Friday, October 1, following the opening of the conference.

Last Friday at the noon hour a horse belonging and attached to the grocery wagon of James P. Treacy, and driven by Donald Maffett, ran away down the alley between the Maffett home and the old court house. At the mouth of the alley the wagon turned turtle and landed against the fence on the lower side of the road, carrying the horse along with it, which remained upon its back until released from the wreckage by a number of men who were attracted to the spot by the noise made by the wagon when it upset and by cries of the little boy who suffered painful injuries to both legs.

Mr. Scott T. Jones, of the Garrett National Bank, made a record run in his Maxwell automobile last Monday. At 8.30 Mr. Jones, accompanied by Miss Grace Jones, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Jones and Mr. J. M. Jarboe, Jr., left Oakland and arrived at Meyersdale before noon, going via McHenry and Bittinger. The return to Oakland was made by way of Grantsville, Keyser's Ridge and the Cove to Accident where supper was served to the party, and they arrived here at about eight o'clock, the distance traveled as shown by the cyclometer being one hundred and two miles. Mr. Jones traversed that portion of the county which he had never before seen and is high in his praise of the many beautiful farms passed during the trip, the evident thrift of the Garrett countians and the future of the section through which he journeyed.

Dr. W. L. Davidson, superintendent of the Mountain Chautauqua, and also manager of the National Chautauqua Bureau, Washington, D. C., returned to the Park last Monday night from a ten days' business visit to Chicago and other western points. The Davidson list of attractions for 1910 is an exceptionally strong one, judging from the preliminary list printed in this office last week, which includes many of the old favorites, among them being Dr. Jahu DeWitt Miller, Rev. George R. Stuart, Governor Robert B. Glenn, Ernest Thompson-Seton and others equally as well known from one end of the country to the other. Then an additional attraction in the Davidson list is Dr. Davidson's own brother, Frank S. Davidson, of "Farmer Hopkins" fame, whose appearance in Oakland and elsewhere in his favorite comedy always crowded the house to the doors. Dr. Davidson is mapping out great work for the National Bureau this winter and his success as a manager is assured.

ON THE ALLEGANIES

A Free Advertisement and Some Other Things about Beautiful Mountain Lake Park.

[From the Carroll Record:]

There is one aggravating feature of a mountain vacation, and that is the weather. Of course, weather conditions, everywhere, has much to do with the pleasure of an outing, but in our experience there is no brand of weather so panicky, or so disagreeable, when it is disagreeable, as that which is at home on this mountain's top, and everything here seems to add to it. For instance, when it rains, it is invariably a cold rain, and as all hotels and cottages are constructed for sleeping and eating conveniences, and not for indoor life, about the only way to keep comfortable on cold rainy days, is to go to bed. Ideally, a vacation in the mountains is an outdoor vacation; taking walks, enjoying the magnificent scenery and breathing in the tonic atmosphere; but as a matter of fact, the ideal is pretty apt to give way to the real, and the real in our case was four days of cold, damp, showery, rheumaticky, wish-I-was-home kind.

However, for four days now we have had the real thing—altogether too fine to describe, and everybody is happy. Even on the nice mornings we are having now, the thermometer ranges from 34 to 36 degrees, while fire-place fires and heavy blankets are decidedly comfortable. The most of the day the weather is fine and bracing.

Mountain Lake Park, in spite of a full week of cloudy dampness in the heighth of the Chautauqua program, is having a very successful season, and a splendid program. Altogether we think this is one of the very best of eight we have spent here, and in some respects the best. It is regarded by many the "turning point" which means many improvements for seasons to come. At the service on Sunday, the audience voluntarily gave pledges amounting to over $2000, which will enable the management to have use of an entirely new and separate revenue with which to carry on and develop its work, and the outlook is that many more such subscriptions will be made both this year and next.

Visitors are beginning to realize just how much they enjoy, for which they do not pay anything; to the Park Association. Indeed, the Park has very little revenue, aside from the auditorium, and a very large portion of this goes toward supplying the talent; there is no admission charge to the grounds, no rebate on railroad tickets, and very few concessions sold; in a large measure, the resort is feee to all, and it does not seem fair this should be so. Hence, the beginning, on Sunday to create a new voluntary contribution fund.

Without doubt, coming to Mt. Lake Park is a habit which grows on one; to those who like it, there is nothing which quite takes its place; but, its freedom, and its very cheapness for what you get, is against it. The hotels and cottages too short a season to make money, hence, the tendency to limit boarding accommodations to fit the prices prevailing, and some go away dissatisfied. But, most people do not come here to eat, and enjoy the luxuries of city hotels, or even their own homes, but consider the attractions altogether worth while making some sacrifice for.

The lectures, music, and enjoyments of various kinds, mentally and physically, are all clean, helpful and uplifting, and would be ungrateful indeed to criticize the place harshly.

Next year will be better still, is the optimistic motto, but, if it be no better, it is still good enough. This year we have taken in two new points—Truesdale Farm and Eagle Rock. The former is a delightful spot, eight miles away, on one of the mountain ridges, giving a vast view on two sides. The owner, Col. Truesdale, who lives in Washington as his permanent home, conducts a big sheep farm here, raising only the finest breeds, and does a very profitable business in the sale of select animals and their products. Eagle Rock is perhaps the highest point within driving reach, and is nine miles away. From it one gets a vast panorama on all sides—wonderful hills and valleys of tree tops—a point from which to dream of the vastness of the world, and the smallness of one's self. It is a splendid place for "big headed" people to visit, for if they have anything like true conception of the relative greatness of things, they must realize that, as compared with the Creator of all, they have created mighty little, by their own efforts, with truly grand and lasting characteristics.

Of course, everybody goes to Oakland, 1½ miles distant, that "jumping off" place of Maryland, of which we hear so little. But, Oakland, in the popular slang, "is going some." Just now the streets are all torn up, then torn up some more, for the little city is putting in a complete sewerage system, water, and natural gas—gas for heat, light and power, at 20 cents or 25 cents per 1000—all at one dab, and they will issue bonds for the whole transaction. Moreover, private property is being rapidly improved, and especially in its fashionable section it has many magnificent dwellings which would do credit to the suburban section of any of our large cities. But, the readers of the Record are not likely greatly interested in such items.

We will close this letter with a single odd experience—that of going through a deserted, or unused, fully furnished hotel of 75 rooms—Overlook Inn. A hotel which has been the victim of financial trouble and consequent litigation, mixed with personal stubbornness, for the past four or five years. Through a friend, we secured the key of the building and went through it from top to bottom. The interior, as well as exterior, is going to ruins. Leaking roofs and dampness have played havoc with walls and furniture—and very good furniture too. The dining-room tables, stacked with queensware, glassware and table linen. The bedrooms are furnished, except as to carpets and linen; mattresses—all of them excellent quality felt—the blankets and comforters are more or less in confusion, but there; the oak furniture is swollen and warped, the nicely upholstered parlor furniture is practically ruined; the office paraphernalia, everything about the place, will soon be worthless junk, and one can't help but ask the question, time and again, whether there is any sensible reason for such a condition. The whole muddle seems to rest on two overlapping mortgages, and contrariness, and this is the condition of a beautifully located house, at which we had the unwelcome experience, five years ago, of being turned away because there was "no room at the Inn." We were glad to get out again, for the house seemed to have a lot of dead people in it somewhere.

The last of this week, we hope to be home again, the better for the outing, and our readers the better, perhaps, for a change of editorship—but, next year if any one want to go to Mt. Lake Park, we will take pleasure in giving them "pointers," and perhaps piloting them, for we have unquestionably renewed our allegiance to the place. P. B. E.

AT AUNT NANCE ALFORD'S CABIN.

Story of a Tragedy Averted by a Woman's Determination.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

[Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.]

Alford's Cabin was the name of a stagecoach eating station halfway between two thriving Rocky mountain mining towns. It was kept by Mrs. Nancy Alford, a small, cheery and exceedingly active woman, who claimed for herself the distinction of having crossed the plains with an ox team in 1859 and the further honor of having been the first white woman to enter Fairplay gulch, in which her cabin stood.

Her husband's grave, over which the snows of three winters had drifted, was under a clump of stunted and gloomy pines up the rocky slope of the mountain.

There were two little grassless and sunken graves beside that of Aunt Nancy's husband. In one of them her little girl of five years had been laid and in the other her boy of six.

"I ain't never been back to the states sence I come out here, and I never expect to go now. All I care for in this world is up there," Aunt Nancy would say, with a wave of her hand toward the pines under which were the three graves.

"YOU DON'T KNOW HOW GLAD I AM TO SEE YOU!"

The cabin was a long and narrow one story structure of three rooms. Its exterior was dreary and without a suggestion of the brightness and comfort within save for the turkey red calico curtains with white lace borders.

But within things were very different. Aunt Nance Alford's cabin, Aunt Nance's grub and Aunt Nance herself were topics on which the stage drivers discoursed until Aunt Nance's fame had spread far and wide.

She was a short, slender and wiry little woman about fifty years old. She always wore a plainly made starched calico gown, with a white apron tied around her waist, the strings in a neat bow in front.

One day in the early spring Jack Hughes, one of the stage drivers, brought Aunt Nance a letter from the nearest postoffice, eight miles distant. Letters came rarely to Aunt Nance, and they always filled her with pleasurable excitement.

This was in a large brown envelope, and Aunt Nance drew out a photograph with the letter.

She glanced at it eagerly and saw the face of a young and delicate girl of perhaps fifteen years.

"Who in the land can she be?" said Aunt Nance. She unfolded the letter, glanced at the signature and read it aloud. "Your affectionate niece, Marcia Merrick.'

"I declare I'd most forgot I had such a niece," said Aunt Nance. "But of course she's my sister Lucy's girl. Lucy's name is Merrick. I ain't heerd from her for two years. It's time some of 'em was writin'."

She sat down and read the letter slowly, her eyes filling with tears as she read. She wiped them on a corner of her apron when she had finished the letter and said to Kate Dooley, her "help:"

"It's from my sister's girl. My sister is dead, and so is her husband. Their girl, Marcia, seems to be all alone in the world and not very strong. She wants to come out and stay with me awhile and try this mountain climate for her health.

"Well, she can come. I'll make her more than welcome. It's many a year since I see any of my own folks, and it'll do me good to see somebody right from New Hampshire with the Doolittle blood in her veins. I was a Doolittle, Kate."

She read the letter again. It was well written and stated briefly, in addition to the news which Aunt Nance had already communicated to Kate, that the writer was nearly sixteen years old and that she would have her own living to make, for her parents had left her little more than enough money to take her to Colorado.

"We'll talk about her supportin' herself when there's occasion for her to do it," said Aunt Nance as she folded the letter and restored it to its envelope.

She took up the photograph and looked at it long and lovingly.

"She's a Doolittle, out and out," she said. "She has the reg'lar Doolittle nose and her grandfather's chin right over ag'in. She's downright purty; she looks like her ma, and Lucy was the best lookin' one of our family. But she don't write a word about her brother! I wonder how that is. Lucy had two children."

Three weeks later the stagecoach came whirling up to Aunt Nance's door, and Jack Hughes called out when he saw Aunt Nance at the open door:

"Light load today, Aunt Nance—only one passenger, and I guess she's the one you're lookin' for."

A young girl, her plain black dress and hat covered with dust, stepped to the ground. Aunt Nance embraced her warmly.

"You're sister Lucy's Marcia!" she exclaimed excitedly. "I know without askin'. You're a reglar Doolittle, and you don't know how glad I am to see you!"

"You don't really look strong," Aunt Nance said while Marcia was eating the elaborate dinner prepared expressly for her. "But, la, my dear, you'll look like another girl after a summer up here in this mountain air."

Then she suddenly asked in a softer tone, "Where is your brother David, Marcia?"

Marcia's smile gave place to a pained and troubled look.

"I don't know, aunt," she said.

"Don't know? Why, how is that?"

"It is more than a year since we have heard anything from David," said Marcia. Then she added: "That is one reason why I wanted to come west, Aunt Nancy, besides what the doctor told me about my health. I think David is out here. I did not write anything about it, for I thought I would rather tell you all about it myself. I thought you might understand the story better and feel more kindly toward him to see you!

It was a brief and sorrowful little story of a boy's waywardness that she told, not an uncommon story of a naturally well disposed boy being led into wrongdoing by evil companions and finally running away after bringing disgrace upon his home.

"All we have known for nearly two years is that he is in the west. We heard once of his being in this state. If I could only find him, I am sure he could yet be saved. He is so young—not yet twenty."

"I'll help you find him," said Aunt Nance earnestly. "We'll begin at once. I know all the stage drivers around here and people in nearly all the mountain towns. If he's anywhere in this part of the state we'll find him, dear. Merrick ain't a common name."

The mountain summer soon came on in all its soft and tender beauty. Marcia lived out of doors much of the time. She rode on horseback down into the grassy gulches or far up to the mountain summits, where the snow lay in little patches throughout all the summer days. Soon the color came to her cheeks. Her thin shape grew rounder and fuller.

The night of the 19th of August was one long remembered by the dwellers on that mountain side and by those in the gulch below. They referred to it long afterward as "the time of the big storm."

At 9 o'clock the wind abated its fury. At 10 it had died away so that no sound was heard but the pouring of the rain. Marcia and Kate Dooley went to bed.

It was 11 o'clock when Aunt Nance, rising to go to bed, stopped suddenly, threw up her head and listened.

The rain was falling softly now, and high above its gentle sound she heard a voice shriek out as if in mortal terror. Then she heard men's voices shouting wildly.

"What in the name of wonder is goin' on up there on Taylor mountain at this time of night?" she asked herself as she hurried to a door and looked out into the darkness.

"Dear, dear!" she said, with more of irritation than of fear in her voice. "I wonder when this country's ever goin' to get civilized so folks 'll live as if they was Christians! There's mischief goin' on up there! I saw them Taylor mountain boys whisperin' together and lookin' savage when they were down here to dinner today. I've a notion to— Who's that?"

The rear door of the room had opened suddenly and been closed.

Aunt Nance turned quickly. Before her, his back to the door, his hands spread out upon it as if he would hold it against all resistance, stood a hatless and coatless young man, his clothes drenched and tattered, his face ashen pale, his eyes wild and staring, while his slender form quivered with fear.

"Oh, please come in and shut that door!" he cried, stretching out one hand imploringly. "They're after me—those men are! Can't you hide me? I haven't done what they say I have. Hide me! Hide me!"

Aunt Nance slowly closed the door, but seemed to hesitate.

"Ma'am," said the young man, "I've been wild for a long time, but I am innocent of this wrong, and if you'll help save me I will live a right life from this moment. I'll go back home tomorrow—back to New Hampshire!"

"New Hampshire!" Aunt Nance caught eagerly at the words.

"Are you from New Hampshire?" she asked slowly.

"Yes, yes! Oh, are they coming?"

"From what town?" she asked eagerly.

"The town of Rockingham."

"Now tell me your name, quick!"

"David—David Merrick."

She took his wet cheeks between her hands and drew his face down to hers, while she kissed him soothingly.

"I thought so—I thought so," she said, with her arms around his neck. "You've the Doolittle eyes, David. Don't be afraid."

The door of Marcia's room had opened suddenly, and she stood there with a shawl thrown lightly around her. The next instant she cried out:

"Oh, it's David—my brother David!"

The tramp of feet was heard outside. The look of amazement on the boy's face gave place to one of terror, and Aunt Nance said quickly:

"Go in there with your sister, David."

A moment later six or seven rough looking men filed into the cabin. Aunt Nance knew them every one. She met them standing with her back to the door of the room David and his sister had entered.

"He come in here, didn't he, Aunt Nance?" said Joe Haskin, the leader of the crowd. "We seen him, and we want him. Now, didn't he come in here?"

Aunt Nance replied fearlessly: "I don't tell lies, and I won't tell one now. He did come in here, Joe Haskin. He's in here now, and, what's more, he's goin' to stay in here!"

"Do you know what him and another feller done?"

"I neither know nor care," replied Aunt Nance boldly, "but I know this—you men ain't his judges. Vengeance don't belong to you. It belongs to Him!"

She pointed upward as she spoke, and then she added: "You can't lay your hands on that boy tonight. He's in this room behind me, and you are six or eight men to one woman, but there's not one of you that'll lay your hands on me to move me from this door.

"You wouldn't, Joe Haskin, when you remember how I walked three miles in the worst snowstorm we had last winter to nurse you back to life and strength when you was at death's door with pneumony.

"You wouldn't, Hi Sanders, when I had you brought right here and took care of you myself when you had that broken leg last fall.

"You wouldn't lay hands on the woman who closed your wife's eyes in death less than a year ago, Tom Leeson. Every man of you has set at my table ag'in and ag'in, with or without money—it made no difference.

"Touch me? Why, I don't believe I myself could keep you from usin' that rope you've got outside on the man who'd lay rough hands on Aunt Nance Alford."

"No, you couldn't," said Joe Haskin. "You're right—we'd make mincemeat of him! And if you're goin' to stand 'fore that door and"—

"I am," interrupted Aunt Nance, "and there ain't no other way into the room."

She waved her hand lightly toward the open door. "Good night!" she said.

They went out into the darkness.

Before noon the next day Joe Haskin rode up to Aunt Nance's cabin. She went to the door, and he did not dismount.

"Well," he said, "if things don't turn out queer sometimes! We got after the wrong fellow sure enough last night. You see, there's been a gang of cutthroats and hoss thieves 'lurkin' about on Taylor mountain. The boys got tired of 'em, and last night they took after a couple of the sneaks.

"It seems that this young fellow told the truth when he said he didn't b'long to 'em. He was wanderin' along on his way to Eagle cliff and took refuge from the storm with some o' the gang.

"The guilty ones was caught this mornin' down in Deer gulch, and they'd the grace to say that the young fellow with 'em didn't belong to their gang. If you've got him in your cabin yit you sort o' 'pologize to 'im for the little inconvenience we put 'im to last night and say that we'll do anything we can for him now't he's out o' bad company."

He was done with bad company from that day forth. The promise he had made in his terror he kept faithfully, although he did not have to go back to New Hampshire to keep it.

Invading lines of railroad have driven the lumbering old stagecoaches and their jolly drivers to other parts of the mountains, and there is now a little brown railroad station on the spot where the cabin of Aunt Nance once stood.

It is a dinner station famous all along the line, and if you were to travel that way you would be likely to be met at the door by a tidy and talkative old lady, who would be no other than Aunt Nance herself, while David and Marcia Merrick, in homes of their own, may be found in the little town but a few miles distant.

DIRT ROAD IMPROVER

Wonderful Change Made by Using the Split Log Drag.

DIRECT, EFFECTIVE RESULTS.

Dragging a Road When Muddy Fills In Ruts and Closes Up Uneven Spaces—Persistent Use of Drag Will Soon Make a Smooth, Hard Surface.

It has been said that only 10 per cent of the roads in the entire United States are the main traveled highways. The other 90 per cent are the common, everyday country dirt roads. In the ordinary discussion regarding road improvement our thoughts and energies so frequently lead us to the discussion of macadamized roads, brick, stone and other specially constructed roadbeds that the vast majority of our dirt roads are lost sight of. We talk about necessity for road rollers and road scrapers, rock crushers and various other essential roadmaking devices, and then when we figure out the cost of such roads at from $3,000 to $15,000 per mile we oftentimes wonder how many generations it will take for our dirt roads to be adequately maintained, according to the best systems. Because of the utter hopelessness of getting macadamized or other expensive improved roads in his locality in Missouri a man named D. Ward King built a drag out of a log split in half some thirteen years ago, and after every rain, while the mud was soft, he drove up and down the road in front of his farm for half a mile, pulling the drag at an angle of forty-five degrees. Such marvelous improvement resulted from the use of this primitive device that scientific investigation by road engineers has been instigated, and the matter has now passed beyond the experimental or guesswork stage.

The 90 per cent of our dirt roads in the United States, properly dragged after a rain, can be made almost as satisfactory during the greater part of the year as expensively hard surfaced highways and at a ridiculously small cost per mile, carrying from $5 to $100. In the light of the impossibility of macadamizing all our 2,000,000 miles of roads in the United States in one generation or even in any limited period of time, and in the light of the effective and immediate results obtained from dragging the highways, the study of this method can be followed with much profit.

First of all, dragging a road when muddy fills in the ruts, closes up uneven spaces and makes a smooth surface. Of course traffic over such a road will immediately proceed to cut it up again. However, as the dragging is persisted in and the mud is worked into a clayey-like mass and becomes dry it likewise becomes hard. Eventually the top of the road presents a resistant, shell-like cake of tough mud as hard as unburnt brick.

After a time it will be noticed that a road that has been dragged will become dry much sooner than neglected stretches of road in the same neighborhood. The more attention given to dragging a road the quicker will it dry out ahead of its neighbors. Eventually after several years of persistent dragging the mud shell on the surface of such a road will become so hard that even after a cloudburst of rain a pick will with difficulty be made to penetrate the surface for over two inches.

By the skilled use of the drag the road can be made high in the middle. The average neglected country road is usually hollow in the middle and after a rain has small lakes and pools standing over its surface, sometimes for many days and weeks. But the dragged road, having such a crown, sheds water into the side gutters.

These facts to the uninitiated or skeptical may on first impression seem farfetched or exaggerated, but they are facts based on the experience of reputable men from Missouri to New York state who have been dragging the country dirt roads after every rain.

The roads today in many sections of the United States are no better than they were fifty years ago, even with the labor and money that have been expended upon them. In some localities almost the entire amount of the tax is expended in temporary work, while nothing is spent for permanent improvement, with the result that conditions remain unchanged. The sooner we can get a system of road dragging inaugurated in every community the sooner will we have the 90 per cent of our neglected dirt roads adequately and permanently improved throughout the greater part of the year in the United States. — Donald McCaskey, M. D.

Needless Wear of Roads by Autos.

A county surveyor protests against the habit which many motorists have of doing the majority of their driving on the crown or center of the road. This method of driving means that one portion of the road takes all the wear and naturally, of course, gets worn into ruts and ridges. If the traffic would spread itself and make all that portion of the road from gutter to the top of the crown take a share of the wear, road surfaces would last much longer and would require less frequent repair. In these days when roads are made almost flat there is no excuse for this habit of clinging to the crown, but where roads are made with a great deal of camber it is perhaps excusable, as driving on a continuous slope is the reverse of pleasant.

GAS TANKS AND TOWN BEAUTY

Louis Heaton Pink's Views on Their Proper Location.

The Consolidated Gas company of New York a few years ago erected a large gas tank along Riverside drive, shadowing Grant's tomb. There was opposition from the press, but nothing was done. The Flatbush Gas company, a subsidiary of the Brooklyn Union, recently completed a tank 191 feet in diameter and 237 feet high in Flatbush, in the borough of Brooklyn. This is the highest structure in the borough. It stands in a region of homes and immediately adjacent to the Kings County hospital and other public buildings. It has taken away from many the equity in their homes and is a blot upon the landscape for miles around. The public service commission was first appealed to by the property owners and civic associations of Flatbush, but it decided that it had no jurisdiction. Two suits for an injunction were brought, one by the property owners and one by the city of New York. The city was defeated at special term, and recently the appelate division dismissed its appeal with scant courtesy on the ground that an offense to the sight cannot be a nuisance. This is not good logic and should not be good law. If such a structure unreasonably destroys the comfortable enjoyment of property it comes within the definition of nuisance. No one of the senses should be discriminated against. It is to be hoped that the court of appeals will have opportunity to pass upon this question.

American cities were formerly concerned only with growth. Now they are placing their energies in development. Eyesores such as this, destructive of property and the beauty of a city or town, should not be tolerated. Gas tanks and all their kith and kin should be placed not where it is most economical, but where they will do the least harm. When erected in a city or town they should be built of moderate height. The "skyscraper" tanks are unnecessarily harmful. If the courts will not protect municipalities against such invasion adequate laws should be at once enacted. In England tanks may not be erected within 300 yards of a residence without the consent of the owner and occupants. In no continental city can tanks be placed without regard for public welfare. The location of gas works and tanks should be subject to the approval of the public service commission, and the consent of owners of houses used exclusively for residential purposes within a prescribed distance should be required. We guard residential sections against saloons by such a law. Who would not prefer a saloon as a neighbor to a huge gas tank?—Louis Heaton Pink in Survey.

BEAUTY IN FRONT YARDS.

How to Plant Shrubbery For an Ornamental Effect.

If you wish to help in making your home town attractive, improve the front yard with some shrubs.

For a small front yard where it is impracticable to plant trees there is nothing better for ornamental effect than a few well placed shrubs. Once planted and established in the soil they require little attention except in spring, when they should be pruned back so as to keep them symmetrical.

In planting shrubs much will depend upon the layout of the lot and its topography. It is easier to spoil an effect than it is to obtain a good one. It is a good plan to get the advice of a competent landscape gardener. If you can't, study your yard and its possibilities thoroughly before you set out a shrub. A plain greensward is far more desirable from an artistic standpoint than a lot littered with a miscellaneous collection of shrubs placed without regard to harmony in the general scheme.

For a small yard among the best shrubs, aside from the roses, are the hydrangeas, of which there are several varieties, some dwarf; the honeysuckles, Japanese snowball, barberry, rose acacia, Irish yew, Catalpa bungii, Magnolia conspicua, Magnolia soulangiana, Japanese cypress and the many varieties of evergreens. The evergreens, however, appear to better advantage in roomy yards.

Then there are the white and purple lilacs, Japanese quince, Syringa grandiflora, althea Jeanne d'Arc, pure white; Deutzia graeilis and the azaleas. These shrubs are hardy, rapid growing, attain large size and bear beautiful flowers. The azaleas should be given a northern exposure and be well protected in winter.

Many of these shrubs will be found growing in the park shrubberies, and those who have friends among the park gardeners can obtain valuable advice from them about the planting and care of shrubs.

Profitable Shade Trees.

A stranger visiting Tallahassee, Fla., is surprised at the great number of pecan trees found in the yards, gardens and on the streets. They are everywhere, and thousands upon thousands spring up every season where the nuts are washed by the rains or dropped by the birds, which feast upon them. If these trees had been budded with merchantable varieties when young they would now be producing thousands of bushels of the finest nuts annually, but of even these inferior varieties Tallahassee sells hundreds of dollars' worth each year.

Value of Advertising.

Don't forget that every bit of advertising you do does more than advertise the actual goods mentioned. It acts as a general advertisement of the store and possesses a cumulative effect that cannot be calculated by immediate results.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

Lesson XI.—Third Quarter, For Sept. 12, 1909.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, Acts xxi, 1-17. Memory Verses, 13, 14—Golden Text, Acts xxi, 14—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

(Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.)

When the time came to leave Tyre the disciples there, men, women and children, accompanied Paul's party out of the city down to the shore, and all kneeled down on the shore and prayed. What an object lesson for those who may have been looking on! There are always some watching us who draw their own inferences from our conduct as to whether we are worldly or other worldly, whether we are for the most part in communion with earth or heaven. Some who bear the name of Christ have been known to shrink from praying before others or even asking a blessing on their food. What can He think of those who are thus ashamed of Him? (Matt. x, 33.)

As at Miletus, so here at Tyre we have another painful separation when Paul and his companions set sail and the friends from Tyre return to their homes, but we trust that all hearts were more than ever turned to Him who is our continual habitation (Ps. lxxi, 3) and from whose presence some day we shall go no more out. One day at Ptolemais, where they also found brethren, and then to Caesarea, where they tarried many days in the home of Philip the evangelist, who had four daughters, virgins, who did prophesy. We recall that Philip was greatly used of God in Samaria and then to lead the Ethiopian treasurer to Christ, after which he preached in all the cities from Azotus to Caesarea (Acts viii, 40), but that seems to be the last we have heard of him till now. God gave to the churches apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ (Eph. iv, 11, 12), and were it not that Philip is still called the evangelist we might think that he had become pastor of the church at Caesarea and that Cornelius and his household were members of that church. There are so many things we are not told and we are curious enough to want to know, but we must wait to find out why we hear nothing more of Philip's active ministry and to learn what he was doing at Caesarea. Then these daughters of his—in what sense did they prophesy?

Concerning it all it comes to me continually that there is only One with whom we have to do, and if we are filling the place He assigns us, be its service small or great, that is all He requires of us, whether other people know much or little or anything about it. He appoints to every one his work and says "occupy till I come" (Mark xiii, 34; Luke xix, 13). He knows in what part of His field His plants will thrive best and bear the fruit that He desires, so it is ours to quietly abide in Him and see no one but Jesus only. We may imagine what a time of prayer and praise and study of the word those days in Caesarea were and how they would listen to Paul declaring what things God had wrought by his ministry (verse 19), for as he afterward did at Jerusalem he probably did here also and elsewhere. While at Caesarea a prophet from Judea named Agabus by a striking object lesson foretold that at Jerusalem Paul would be arrested and imprisoned, upon which the disciples there as well as Paul's own companions besought him not to go to Jerusalem. Paul's reply to them all was that he was ready, not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus (verse 13). Compare his words to the Ephesian elders at Miletus in chapter xx, 24. Both of these are splendid utterances of a whole hearted servant of Christ who would not by any persuasion of friends be turned aside from what he believed to be the Lord's way for him. When they saw that he would not be persuaded they simply ceased urging him and said, "The will of the Lord be done" (verse 14). Being joined by several of the disciples from Caesarea and by an old disciple from Cyprus named Mnason, who was to lodge them, they in due time reached Jerusalem and were gladly received by the brethren. Thus ended the third missionary journey.

Concerning the will of the Lord to which they desired to submit when they found that they could not persuade Paul not to go to Jerusalem, there can be nothing greater or higher and when His will shall be done on earth as in heaven that will be the kingdom of God on this earth. Our Lord Jesus could say, "I delight to do Thy will, O my God;" "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me and to finish His work" (Ps. xl, 8; John iv, 34). In proportion as His will is done in us now, that good and acceptable and perfect will of God (Rom. xii, 1, 2), we have just that much of the kingdom in us, a foretaste of eternal glory. May we ever say from the heart cheerfully, "Thy will be done." Is it possible for us to think that we are in the will of God when we are simply working out our own will? It is to be feared so. I could believe that Paul was right in resisting all the entreaties of his fellow believers and fellow laborers unto the kingdom and determining to go to Jerusalem at any cost were it not that the Spirit said to Paul that he should not go (verses 4, 11). The disciples said to Paul through the Spirit that he should not go.

THE STATE AS A FRUIT PRODUCING SECTION

Maryland's Nuseries Take High Rank Among States.

Although a small state, Maryland can boast of growing more trees and plants from her nurseries than any State of the Union in proportion to her acreage. In fact, some of the individual nurseries are as large as any in the country. It is estimated that over 38,000,000 trees and plants are sold from Maryland nurseries each year. In order to aid the nurserymen in producing good clean nursery stock and also to protect the grower from being cheated by the unreliable or irresponsible tree agent or nurserymen of this or any other state, the State Horticultural law, which was enacted is 1898, requires the State Entomologist and State Pathologist to inspect all the nurseries in the State annually. These officers have been engaged in this work during the past month. In all 55 nurseries have been inspected and the officers report that the nurseries in the State are in a better condition this year than ever before. When it is considered that Maryland has individual nurseries containing over 1,000 acres, growing millions of trees, the task of inspection can be appreciated.

Upon complying with the requirments of the State officers each nurseryman is issued a certificate of inspection, a copy of which must accompany every shipment of trees or plants sold. Likewise the law requires all nurserymen of other States desiring to do business in this State to first file a copy of their official certificate in this office, and accompany a copy of same with each shipment into the State. Thus the grower should see to it that a certificate shows that the stock has been inspected by State officials of this or other States before accepting nursery stock of any character.

The inspection of nurseries in this State is as rigid as it is possible to make it, and the officers report that the nurserymen of the State extend all the co-operation possible in the aiding of the officers in the performance of their duty. It is firmly believed that Maryland nurseries grow as good a class of nursery stock of all kinds as do the nurserymen of any State in the Union,

Persons in the State who expect to dispose of nursery stock and have not notified the State officers should do so at once.

THE SPIRIT OF DISCONTENT.

It has been said that "discontent is the origin of progess," and in one sense the saying is perfectly true. Nations and individuals that are fully satisfied with present conditions are not very likely to bestir themselves and push on to higher things. They are more apt to stagnate. History shows this clearly enough. Take, for instance, the Chinese. Long centuries ago, when our barbarous ancestors were roaming through forests primeval, the almond-eyed Orientals were among the first and foremost peoples of the civilized world and had made long strides forward in the arts and sciences. But having once reached a certain stage of development, their pride and self-conceit led them to consider themselves as near perfection as need be, with the result that they have been practically at a standstill ever since—at least until recently. If we except the Japanese, the same holds true of nearly every other Asiatic people. Again, if Europeans and Americans had been content with the ancient and mediaeval modes of locomotion, we would never have had our steamboats and railroads, our electric railways and, a fortiori, the modern means of aerial navigation.

Discontent, then, understood in this sense, is something highly commendable. It is nothing more nor less than the desire to bring out the best that is in us. It is a wish to better conditions, to improve the world and bring it as near as possible to perfection. There is nothing chimerical or utopian about it; it is self-restrained, reasonable and kept within due bounds. It aims only at the realizable. It is a source of emulation and praiseworthy rivalry, spurring men on to surpass one another in conferring benefits on mankind at large. It is not only useful, but likewise essential for the evolution of the race.

There is another sense, however, in which discontent is not the origin of progress, but the very reverse---a sense in which it is not at all laudable, but, on the contrary, one of the worst curses that can light on individuals or nations. We mean here the discontent of sulkiness--the discontent of despair —the state of those who are disgruntled and at the same time hopeless; who are ever thinking of, and aspiring to the, unattainable. This is the discontent of pessimism as the former is the discontent of optimism. To make our meaning clearer and plainer, if need be, it is not at all uncommon to find chronic grumblers who are dissatisfied with the gifts God has given them and the station of life for which they are by nature fitted. They want to be what they can never be, and being unable to reach the goal of their desires, decide te sit down idly, with folded arms, and do nothing. They must be either leaders or nobodies—as if an army composed entirely of generals, or a navy of admirals, would be of any earthly use to a nation.

Such an attitude is the bitter enemy of all human progress and the foster-parent of stagnation. Those who are so afflicted evidently lose sight of the fact that society, like the individual, is a living organism composed of many and varied members, and that its essential well-being depends on the harmonious working or co-operation of its different parts. All can't be the head, or the eye, or the ear. Some must of necessity fill the minor parts; and these minor parts are just as important in their way as the more conspicuous offices. And just as in the human body we value all the members, so in society at large, absolutely speaking, there is no vocation mean or ignoble. Shakespeare tells us that "the world's a stage and all the men and women players thereon." That is true enough. But there is one great, striking difference between the theatrical stage and the great drama of human life. On the former, as a rule, the leading lights-- the star actors and actresses—get most of the applause; those who are forced to play the lesser roles often get but scant notice. But on the great, wide stage, where the Author of our being is both judge and audience, it matters not what part we play—whether it be prominent or obscure—provided we play it well. The hodcarrier and the poor washwoman, who perform conscientiously and exactly the duties of their lowly state, may be far more pleasing to their Maker than the professional man, the monarch or the genius—certainly, a consoling reflection.

Besides, in this world nothing succeeds like success. For most men it means everything; while the Creator regards not the amount of success we obtain, but the efforts we put forth—our earnestnes, our sincerity and good will. To do cheerfully and well—to the very best of our ability—the duties of the position in life for which the God of Nature has fitted us, this is the real test, the true and only solid gauge of genuine human worth.

KING EDWARD'S STOCK FARM

Shorthorns, Sheep, Horses and Other Animals of Finest Breed.

King Edward, who paid his annual visit to the Smithfield Club Cattle Show recently, has been an enthusiastic agriculturist for nearly half a centry, says the London Express. For many years his shorthorns, shires, thoroughbreds, hackneys, Southdown sheep and so forth have been second to none in the kingdom. His Majesty's success as a farmer forms a striking testimony to the versatility o, his interests. It would be erroneously suppose that the King wins at the agricultural and Smithfield show merely because he is king. Farmers, who ought to know, are quick to controvert the idea. The king never shows an animal he has not bred himself, and his cattle win purely on their merits, because they are the best. Since he came to the throne affairs of state have prevented His Majesty from devoting as much time as he would like to his farming and agricultural interests. He is no longer able to occupy his mornings, as he did when prince of Wales, sitting in his pleasant business room at Sandringnam, receiving and instructing the bailiffs and others concerned in the management of his 2,000 acre farm.

But in spite of his multifarious engagement the king still manages to continue and supervise the breeding of stock, His stockkeepers are enthusiastic in his service, and the result has been that the King is even more successful at the shows now than he was when prince of Wales. King Edward may well be proud of his remarkable record, particularly if he recalls the condition of the Sandringham farm lands, whence many of these triumphs have come, before he put them into cultivation. A famous agriculturist who inspected the land before King Edward set about transforming it reported: "It is a very barren soil, barely capable of cultivation." Could he visit the land today he would, indeed, be amazed at the revolution which has made Sandringham one of the finest stock-raising farms in the country.

The result of His Majesty's labors is summarized by an unimpeachable authority. Rider Haggard, who says: "It is a wonderful farm, for I imagine that nowhere is so much high-bred stock to be seen upon the same area; at least, in all my extensive journeyings throughout the 26 counties in England of which I have examined the agricultural I have not found its equal." King Edward's example and patronage have been of incalculable benefit to agriculture in England. He has always been earnestly interested in the work of the Royal Agricultural Society, of which he has been present several times, and he is also a patrom of the British Dairy Farmers' Association. If there is one department of the farming in which King Edward takes particular pleasure it is that of horsebreeding, and he is greatly delighted, therefore, at the achievement of his shire stallion, Premvictor, in winning the first prize in the International Live Stock Exhibition at Chicago.

The success of the King's shires hes been extraordinary. At one sale 54 of his horses realized an average of £224 each. The King's Southdowns and shorthorns are as famous today as they were in the heyday of his active farming when prince of Wales. Only a few months ago one of his shorthorn bulls, Pride of Sunshine, fetched the high price of 400 guineas. Not that this is a record One such bull, destined for Argentena, brought no less than 1,000 guineas. The Sandringham shorthorns are covered by breeders everywhere, and picked bulls from among them have often sold for fabulous sums. Dog-fancying hardly comes within the average farmer's scope, but it is well to note that the Sandringham Farm contains some of the finest kennels in this or any other country.

DEDICATION OF HOMES

The New Ceremony Introduced Into New Hampshire.

The Home of the President of the New Hampshire State Board of Agriculture and Treasurer of the State Grange Selected For First Honors.

[Special Correspondence.]

One of the late events in grange circles in New Hampshire was the first use of the new ceremony for dedicating the rural home, the ritual for which was written and presented to the national grange, or the Order of Patrons of Husbandry, by Mortimer Whitehead of New Jersey, past lecturer of the national grange, and which was formally adopted by that body at its session last November. The work was performed by a "team" from the eastern New Hampshire Pomona grange, being committed to memory. George R. Drake, secretary of the state grange, acted as director.

The Pomona grange first met in regular session with one of the largest attendances in its twenty-five years' history, as 350 sat down to the sumptuous dinner. The home dedicated, which is named Hill Top Farm, was that of Joseph D. Roberts, president of the state board of agriculture and treasurer of the state grange. It is a farm of 400 acres devoted to dairying and fruit growing and has been in the Roberts family for several generations.

The ceremony was smoothly and impressively rendered, and it was universally commended. Nearly all the officers of the state grange and the head Patrons of the state were present. State Master Herbert O. Hadley gave an able address on "Our Homes."

The universally high praise with which this beautiful home dedication ceremony has been received by the Order everywhere promises its right to live, and a hundred years from now and as long as the grange stands and rural homes are to be built up, beautified and protected in our land of homes it will be a monument to the lifelong devotion and work of Mortimer Whitehead in assisting in building the grange and to his efforts for the higher and brighter life of the farm.

PENNSYLVANIA MATTERS.

The Farmers Didn't Get Much From the Last Legislature.

Answering a question as to what special laws had been enacted by the legislature of Pennsylvania at the past session in the interest of the farmer, State Master Creasy writes as follows:

The session of the Pennsylvania legislature which adjourned in April did very little for the farmer. The only thing of any importance that was enacted was a change in the township road law whereby the state pledges itself to pay 50 cents for every dollar raised in cash for road purposes, such amount not to exceed $20 per mile. But the appropriation to carry this out was reduced from $1,500,000 to $500,000, which will not be enough money to redeem this promise. The grange will make a determined fight to have this pledge redeemed by the next legislature. The appropriation for state roads was also very materially reduced by the governor.

The state grange is giving special attention to the picnic season, and in extending the order a number of new halls are being dedicated. The grange sentiment is growing, and we expect to add a number of new granges to those already organized and reorganized.

W. T. CREASY.

Have Plenty of Seats.

Make the rally an informal outing, active, joyous and one that leaves a sense of having been a "pleasure exertion" well worth while. Avoid hiring professionals or introducing claptrap devices for amusement. The grange can develop leaders for recreative occasions as well as all serious. An important detail is to have plenty of seats for the company, located not too far from the speakers' stand.

New England Fruit Show.

There is to be a big fruit show in Boston in October. All New England is getting interested. The subject is now engaging the attention of many granges, particularly in Maine. A premium list of $10,000 is already assured.

Often "esteemed contemporaries" speak of the "president" of a grange. There is no such officer. The presiding officer is the "master."

STOYER.

Our old friend Jack Frost visited us early Monday morning, but it happened that all the "village greens" were indoors and escaped the danger.

Our two spendthrifts who were away last week attending the Clarksburg Fair, returned Thursday night with red mud on their shoes and coal cinders in their hair and each carried a small box of tin whistles, paper fans, baby balloons, tobacco tags and numerous other souvenirs of the wonderful "fair."

Mr. Henry Harper, who has been engaged in the lumber business at Three Fork for some time, is again with us, and expects to remain here during the Autumn months.

Mr. John Steyer and wife were visiting in town the first of the week.

Miss Elizabeth Melvin, who spent most of the summer with her brother, Thos. Melvin, has returned to her home in the northern part of the county.

Sunday a number of young people were entertained at the home of W. T. Steyer. Among other luxuries he set before his guests some very fine apples. These apples had been in Mr. Steyer's cellar for just twelve months, and they had retained their texture, color and flavor perfectly, and looked as though they would have lasted another year in the storage room.

Mrs. Lucas, of Pennsylvania, stopped for a short time at the residence of P. J. Melvin one day last week.

Returning from services at White Church Sunday night, in passing the home of Miss Verna Steyer a gleaming eyed and fiery toothed monster was noticed stanoing near the gate. Upon examination it was found to be carved from the shell of a large pumpkin, on the inside of which was placed a lighted candle. After a long consultation of the wisest heads in the crowd it was pronounced a "beau catcher."

James A. Harvey, of near Wilson, W. Va., was visiting in town recently.

Emory Shillingburg was on our streets the other evening.

The Rev. Idleman preached to an attentive congregation Saturday evening.

Alex. Harvey and W. Harrison Steyer, of Kearney, were in town Sunday afternoon.

Miss Ida Harvey was here Monday, preparatory to the opening of our school on the 13th of September.

John T. Steyer spent a day in Oakland the first of the week.

BITTINGER.

On last Monday morning a heavy frost visited this section of the county and did considerable damage to late crops, especially late buckwheat and corn that was not yet ripe.

Prof. Loraditch, of Oakland, was in this village one day last week making an effort to interest the people in life insurance policies.

The most reliable reports from the farms on which the season's crop of oats has been threshed, show an average yield of about thirty bushels to the acre.

G. W. Engle, of Baltimore, spent a few days this week with his family at this place.

Mrs. Duckworth and two sons, of near Straun, Pa., were guests at Joel Orendorff's last Saturday and Sunday.

Rev. Alvin Yugel returned last Tuesday from a two weeks' vacation spent on the Eastern Shore of Maryland.

Fred Ries, of Accident, purchased a load of young chickens in this settlement on Monday.

Messrs. Noah and Leonard Stark, of Chaffee, W. Va., spent last Sunday with their parents at this place.

Jonas Bittinger, a farmer residing at this place, states that he dug a hill of potatoes last Saturday, from which he took 106 potatoes and he has the potatoes as evidence to prove it to those of doubtful mind.

E. S. WEST'S SEPTEMBER BULLETIN OF REAL ESTATE

Some Excellent Bargains Offered In Town and Suburban Property.

Mr. E. S. West, the Oakland real estate man, has issued a bulletin for September, in which he offers some rare bargains in town and suburban property.

Oakland's future is promising and an investment in real estate now will bring excellent returns. What Oakland is and what Oakland is to be, is set out in an article "Watch Oakland Grow," published elsewhere in this paper today.

Mr. West's September Bulletin reads as follows:

Dear Friend—

In sending you this partial list of valuable real estate for sale in this vicinity, we wish to call your attention to a circular gotten up by the local Board of Trade, and which is enclosed herewith.

I vouch for the truth of every statement contained therein, and invite you to investigate to your own satisfaction, the resources and many desirable features of this mountain top. My motto is, "My customers must be pleased," and if you fail to find in this partial list of bargains in real estate, what you are looking for, write me, describe what you want, the approximate cost, etc., and I am sure I can find it for you, as my clients have property listed which they do not desire advertised in a public way.

No. 1. 15 Acres in suburbs of Oakland, improved, with good 7-room house, barn, orchard, etc. For sale at $5,000 or for rent at $20 per month, furnished.

No. 2. Good new house of six rooms and a nice lot in desirable part of Oakland, for sale at $1650. This house is equipped for burning natural gas.

No. 3. Good 8-room house in suburbs of Oakland, acre and a half of ground, house could not be built for $3,000; will sell for $2,500.

No. 4. Suburban Home. 10 acres of best land in the country. Highly improved with 6-room house, barn, grainery, wagon shed, poultry house, two wells, orchard, etc. Worth $5,000 of any man's money. Can be had now for $3,700.

No. 5. Excellent home in southern suburbs of Oakland, 11 rooms, plenty of ground, fine shade trees, excellent spring, good views, can be had at a bargain, $5,200.

No. 6. Eight acres good land, 14-room house, and stable, in north suburb of Oakland. Most desirable place in the city. House is strictly modern, including bath room and equipped for burning natural gas, $9,000.

No. 7. 13-room house in Mt. Lake Park, two blocks from Auditorium. Worth $4,000. Owner has to sell and it can be bought, if taken soon, for $2,000.

No. 8. 100 acres near Deer Park, unimproved. Would make excellent farm land. Can be bought for $12.00 per acre.

No. 9. 118 acres half mile from Deer Park, excellent soil, 50 acres cleared, 200 apple trees just coming into bearing. Fair farm house, good springs, plenty of out-buildings, can be had for $3,500.

No. 10. 33 acres three miles west of Oakland, good farm house and stable. 12 acres cleared and fenced. Owner desires to go west. Will sell for $1,400.

No. 11. 22 acres improved. 1 mile from Oakland, ideal place for fruit and poultry farm. Excellent location for summer home. Fine spring of pure water. Will sell for $100 per acre

No. 12. 65 acres half mile out of Oakland. 45 acres cleared. Land lies smooth. Spring of absolutely pure water which could be piped into house. Abundant water at this spring for all farm purposes. Small stream flows through the place. Excellent building site. Ideal place for summer home or sanitarium. This property can be purchased for $100 per acre.

No. 13. 154 acres cleared and well fenced. Good improvements. Fine orchard excellent soil, large boiling spring of ice-cold water right at the house. This is a new farm and the soil which has been analyzed, is found to be the same as that of the best farms near Accident and Grantsville. I can sell this valuable property for $2,600, and there is not a foot of it but what modern farm machinery could be used on.

No. 14. 175 acres near Bittinger, one of the best farms in the locality. 8000 pounds of maple sugar manufactured on this farm this year. Farm lays well and is improved. Owner desires to leave the state and will sell this property for $4,000.

No. 15. Fine home. 9-room house, 19 acres of land, mostly cleared, near Brookside, W. Va. This property can be bought for less than the house cost. Would make a good summer home or poultry and fruit farm.

No. 16. 28 acres on Northwestern Pike, 9 miles south of Oakland. Good farm house, barn and orchard. A snap; $800. Land mostly cleared.

No. 17. Fine building lot in business portion of Oakland. Most desirable place for a modern hotel, which is badly needed, can be bought reasonable.

No. 18. 10-room house and lot. Hot water heat, bath, electric light, natural gas at the door, can be bought for $3700.

No. 19. Good business block near B. & O. depot in business center, ideal location for fine hotel, can be bought for $10,500.

No. 20. Good house and lot on Center street in desirable location. Can be bought if taken soon, for $1,500. Owner does not reside here and has to sell.

No. 21. Fine large home on Alder street known as the "Episcopal Rectory." One of the most desirable residential portions of the city. This property can be bought for $4,000.

No. 22. Corner lot on Sixth and Green streets. Quarter acre ground, nice oak trees, one of the best building lots in town. For sale at $700. Corner lot on Seventh and Oak streets at $550. Two lots on Oak street between Seventh and Eighth streets at $425 each or $800 for the two.

No. 23. Steam Bottling works. Good house and barn on a lot 225 by 200 feet. Excellent spring. For sale at $6,000.

No. 24. Good 8-room house. Acre and half ground. Half way between Oakland and Mt. Lake Park. Very desirable location. For sale at $2,500. House alone would cost $3,000 to build.

No. 25. Valuable farm of 51 acres known as "Morning Side." One mile south of Mt. Lake Park. Improved by good new 8-room house finished in hardwood. Has direct connection with the water works of Mt. Lake Park with a heavy pressure. Splendid bath, hot and cold water, cement cellar, 400 bearing fruit trees. Farm practically all cleared lays smooth. 250 foot poultry house, stable, grainery, etc. This property, if taken soon, can be had for $4,000; house alone cost that money. Perpetual water rights go with this farm.

No. 26. 152½ acres on the Cranesville public road, 4 miles west of Oakland. Good buildings, good fences, 50 fruit trees in bearing, about 50 acres cleared. School fourth mile from the house. Farm is well watered, lays practically level. Soil of wooded portion very rich and easily cleared. This farm in worth $4,500, can be bought, if taken this fall, for $2,700.

No. 27. 214 acres on Backbone mountain about one mile from Altamont and near the railroad. About 50 acres clear and under fence. Small house and outbuildings. Best spring in the country. Analyzed and found to be purer than the water shipped from Tr esdale Heights. Excellent location for sanitarium. Water from this spring alone would be worth thousands of dollars to any one who would ship it to the city. Tract has 75000 of saw timber and will cut 2000 ties. County road runs near the tract and a private road through the place. Would make an ideal sheep or grazing farm and can be bought for $1500.

No. 28. 100 acres on the B. & O. railroad near the town of Hutton in a high state of cultivation. 80 acres cleared. 8-room house, 125 bearing fruit trees. No. 31. 100 acres near Loch Lynn, adjoining farm of Sampson Bittinger, 50 acres cleared, fair buildings, good orchard, land smooth and productive. $500 worth of timber on the place. Will sell for $3,500.

No. 32. 47 acres near Dobbin, W. Va., located on Mason road leading to Oakland. 5-room house, fair out-building, 75 bearing apple trees, choice fruit, 25 acres cleared. Good lime quarry, coal open, one mile for from house. One half mile to school. Will sell for $1600. Mineral rights reserved.

No. 33. Two good dwelling houses in the town of Deer Park. Property of Mrs. J. L. Fitzwater and M. E. George. For sale at $1300.

No. 34. 20 acres of ground. Fine two-story brick house, tenant house, barn, etc., in town of Deer Park. For sale at $7,500. House alone is worth that money and the land is very valuable as town lots or for farming purposes.

No. 35. 12½ acres. 10 minutes walk from Post Office in Oakland. 5-room house, good well, some out-buildings, excellent cut stone cellar. Can be had for $900.

No. 36. 200 acres near Accident. Most excellent farm land. 100 acres cleared, fine stone spring house, good trout fishing, coal on the farm. Sugar camp that will set 1200 vessels. This farm can be had, if taken this fall for $6,000.

No. 37. 122 acres six miles south of Oakland. Hill land, very good orchard 50 acres cleared, good coal mine open on the place. Will sell the coal for $2,000 or the farm including the mineral rights for $3,000.

No. 38. 15-room house with seven acres of ground, good orchard, stable, ect., in the city of Oakland near Highland Park. For sale at $6,500.

No. 39. 50 acres valuable oak timber a mile and a half south of Oakland for $1,000.

No. 40. 2200 acres most valuable timber land in this part of the country, 842 in fee, balance in timber rights only. Land underlaid with lime stone which was optioned at $25 per acre before the last panic. Best logging proposition, practically all down hill. One-half mile from railroad station. 24 mile railroad charter to go with property. Twenty years to remove the timber. Timber composed of 60 per cent oak. Will cut in the neighborhood of 8000 feet per acre. About 3000 feet of poplar to the acre. About 6000 acres of good timber lies behind this tract that will have to come through it. This could be purchased as needed. The price of this 2200 acre tract is $30 per acre.

No. 41. 50 acres smooth land 1 mile west of Hutton on the B. & O. railroad and only 5 miles west of Oakland. 40 acres cleared and under a high state of cultivation. Small farm house, new bank barn 35 by 42 feet. Other outbuildings, a few young fruit trees, land underlaid with coal. Will sell this farm, if taken quick, for $3,000.

No. 43. 9-room house, 1 acre ground in Oakland, nice fruit trees, grapes, two barns, good well of water, good stone cellar, gas line right by the door. $3,000.

No. 44. 500 acres excellent farm land near Swallow Falls. 200 acres cleared, two orchards, fine big farm house and necessary out-building. Place is well watered and an excellent spring of cold water piped to the house. Coal opened on the place. Finest veins of fire clay and white kaolin in the U. S. Fire clay was optioned at $35 per acre at time of late money panic. Railroad is projected by this farm and will no doubt be built soon.

No. 45. 341 acres, 12 room house, barn 40 by 80 feet, all other necessary out-building, excellent young orchard, this farm is level and in high state of cultivation, will cut $2,000.00 worth of hay, fine ice cold spring by the house, buildings are new. This farm is just across the railroad from Mt. Lake Park and one mile from Oakland. It is all cleared but about fifty acres. If this farm were mine I would not exchange it for an equal number of acres anywhere in the U. S. I have been all over the United States and know what I am talking about. It is positively worth twice what is asked for it. Come and see this farm that I am offering for $18,000.

I have for sale some of the best farming lands in the state of South Dakota and other western states and will be glad to furnish you information regarding location, prices, etc. If interested in any of the above propositions or coal and timber land, call on or write,

Executor's Sale

OF VALUABLE

Real Estate

Under and by virtue of a power conferred upon the undersigned as Executor of the last will and testament of Martha Warren, deceased, now of record in the Orphans' Court of Garrett county, he will on the 18th Day of September,

SATURDAY,

1909, at the hour of 11 o'clock A. M., in front of the First National Bank, in the town of Oakland, Maryland, offer for sale at public auction, all the following described real estate, situated adjoining the town of Oakland on the south side, and in what is generally known as "Catonsville:"

1. All that part of Military Lot No. 863 lying South of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and contained within the fence lines maintained by the said Martha Warren, said fence lines being located near the original Military Lot lines of Lot No. 863, or that portion of it South of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad as aforesaid; except about one-half acre which was devised by the said Martha Warren to Levi Zwyers. The part hereby offered for sale contains about five acres and is improved by three dwelling houses, a couple of stables and other outbuildings, and presents a most excellent opportunity to secure a home and location for any one desiring to engage in the trucking or poultry business, as Oakland is known and recognized as a splendid market for all products of this kind.

2. All that part of Military Lot No. 863, lying on the Northeast side of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and between said Railroad and what is known as the "Dead Pond;" this part contains six acres, is unimproved, but presents a splendid opportunity for an investment, as the same is within the town limits, and has about 800 feet frontage on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, convenient to switches and suitable for docks, warehouses or manufacturing establishments, and is the only railroad frontage now available for said purposes within said town.

Terms of sale, Cash.

FRED. A. THAYER, Executor.

I will also, at the same time and place, as agent for Levi Zweyer, offer at public auction the half acre above reserved. The same is improved by a dwelling house, and a number of trees of choice fruit.

Plat of the whole may be seen at my office.

F. A. THAYER.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 33. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1909. NUMBER 29

IN DEFENSE OF MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK ASSOCIATION

The Forward Movement Means Much to Garrett County.

Agitation is good at times, but when it is begun and continued without sufficient cause, it does harm. Such is the present agitation at Mountain Lake Park. It was begun by a series of articles first published in one of our local contemporaries and through this medium has had more or less notice in some other newspapers of the State.

This agitation concerns us all, hence THE REPUBLICAN is impelled to mention certain facts as it sees them.

It is universally conceded that Mountain Lake Park is the largest single financial asset in Garrett county. Every year through its agency approximately $200,000 are spent in Oakland and its vicinity by the visitors and summer residents of Mountain Lake Park. This of itself makes Mountain Lake Park a great factor in the progress and development of Garrett county, but we are persuaded that the other benefits are even greater.

Twenty-five years ago the Mountain Lake Park Association bought a wilderness and a thicket. This has been changed to one of the most beautiful natural parks in the United States. Twenty-five years ago the assessed value of lands in its vicinity was $5 to $10 per acre; today this same land is selling at from $50 to $200 per acre, so that aside from the largely increased property valuation that has been created in Mountain Lake Park itself, it has indirectly added thousands of dollars to the assessable basis of Garrett county.

It is not true, as we see it, that the Mountain Lake Park Association has been or is arbitrary or despotic in its dealings with the property owners within the bounds of the Park. Years ago of its own initiative it organized the Community of Mountain Lake Park in order that every property owner might have a share in its development and its government. This was done by a deed of mutual agreement signed by every cottage owner, including those who were stockholders of the Mountain Lake Park Association, which agreement was witnessed by the late Justice Andrew B. Gonder and is on record in the Clerk's office in Oakland. At this time the Association at its own expense had made all the streets and roads in the Park. The use of these were turned over to the Community without any compensation for the large cost incurred in making them. In addition, all revenues from license fees of every kind, including livery and transfer licenses, were turned over to the Community.

The significance of this is seen in the fact that but for the large numbers of people brought to the Park for the conferences and assemblies that are arranged for by the Association, there would be no demand for livery or transfer licenses. Besides this the Mountain Lake Park Association is the largest taxpayer in the the Community which it organized as a corporation and which it has developed to its present position of influence in this country. Never before in its history has Mountain Lake Park had so many conferences as in the last few years. These conferences have brought to our county many of the leaders of the religious, educational and professional world.

At this time two very important new movements are likely to centre at the Park if this present "flurry" does not interfere. One of the leaders of one of the great denominations recently spent a week at the Park in quest of a location for a considerable colony of summer residents. He returned to his home in the south well pleased with his visit and with the Park. It would be unfortunate indeed if this and other movements that will mean so much should be prevented coming this way.

Already the Park has an excellent supply of water, electric light and sewerage throughout its improved parts and we volunteer the prediction it will shortly have natural gas under a franchise that will in every way be satisfactory to its residents.

We write this not from the viewpoint of a stockholder, which we are not, nor from the viewpoint of a property owner, which we are not, but from the viewpoint of a citizen of Garrett county who has observed with pride the great growth and development of the Park and who realizes its great value—financial, intellectual and social—to our county, and who believes that under its present active and wise management the past achievement is but the promise of greater success in the future. Let all the people lend a hand and have part in this great work.

Court Last Monday.

The many friends of Associate Judge Robert R. Henderson were gratified Monday when that eminent jurist appeared at the court house to preside at the non-jury term of court which was in session that day and which adjourned the same evening. No cases of general interest were heard as is usual at the non-jury terms. Judge Henderson's health, by reason of his summer's sojourn in the mountains, is greatly improved and there is every reason to believe that he will be entirely restored to his usual robust state.

DEMOCRATIC DEFINITION OF "NON-PARTISAN"

A Specious Argument Used In Republican Communities

All over the State of Maryland, from the mountains of Garrett to the sand dunes of far-away Wicomico on the shores of the Chesapeake, everywhere except in the extreme western part of the State, we find the Democratic party in practically absolute control.

We find that 90 per cent of all officeholders are Democrats, and that more than this per cent of the judges are Democrats. In the whole State, of all elective officials who draw salary from the State Treasury, only one is a member of the Republican party. All other elective officials paid by the State are Democrats. Of the eight judges of the Court of Appeals, seven are Democrats and but one is a Republican. This one judge is the only State officeholder in Maryland elected by the people as a Republican.

The Democrats say this makes no difference, that the bench ought to be nonpartisan.

But suppose a different condition to prevail, and that, instead of the Court of Appeals being overwhelmingly Democratic, it were overwhelmingly Republican, do you believe that the Democratic party would be willing to continue it so? Does any reasonable person think that the Democratic party would be contented with an exclusively Republican Court of Appeals, if they could have it or any part of it otherwise? And if seven out of eight members of the bench of the Court of Appeals were members of the Republican party, does anybody imagine for an instant that the Democratic party would listen to Republican appeals for a nonpartisan judiciary, made in order to continue such a state of affairs?

These are matters and questions which the intelligent, thoughtful and patriotic Republican voters of the Fourth Judicial Circuit are now called on to consider. We are asked to sell our political birthright for a mess of Democratic pottage in the form of a so-called "nonpartisan judiciary," a principle which they have never failed to trample under foot when they had opportunity coupled with power. The Republicans of the Fourth Judicial Circuit are in favor of a nonpartisan judiciary, when it is in fact as well as in name. But when, as in this State now and for many years past, a "nonpartisan judiciary" means a bench overwhelmingly and almost exclusively Democratic, we decline to be led astray by the specious arguments and hypocritical pretence of the party which would take all and give nothing. Not merely as members of the Republican party, but as citizens generally, we are sincerely and firmly convinced that at the present time no more notable and beneficent service could well be rendered the real cause of a truly nonpartisan judiciary than by the election of an able and well qualified Republican to the bench of the Court of Appeals.

In support of this view we urge many valid reasons. We do not believe that a nonpartisan judiciary necessarily means a Democratic judiciary, and yet all over the State this seems to be the practical interpretation put upon the phrase by the Democratic party. In every circuit where there is a Democratic majority the Democratic party insists upon the election of Democratic judges, and especially to the bench of the Court of Appeals. In those circuits we hear no discussion of nonpartisanship in connection with the judiciary. In such circuits to advocate the election of a Republican to the bench of the Court of Appeals in the interest of nonpartisanship would be to invite Democratic ridicule. This fact is well known to every Republican and cannot be denied. For the Democratic party, then, to come to the people of the Fourth Judicial Circuit with fair and lofty talk of a nonpartisan judiciary, coupled with a bid for Republican votes wherewith to elect to the bench a Democratic nominee, is a proceeding that makes up in presumption what it lacks in sincerity. For every Republican voter will be ready with this question to ask of the Democratic party: "If you have refused to elect Republican judges in Democratic circuits, why should you ask us to elect a Democratic judge in a Republican circuit?" To this question there is no logical answer. The simple truth is that "nonpartisan judiciary" is a slogan used or not used by the Democracy, as circumstances may dictate. Where its use might interfere with Democratic aims, it is never heard. Where it seems a handy instrument wherewith to reduce or destroy Republican majorities in the interest of a Democratic nominee the cry is heard in the land all day long as well as in the watches of the night. But the fact remains and will not down that there never was a time in the history of the Democratic party when it preached the doctrine of a nonpartisan judiciary except in pursuit of its own selfish purposes.

If the contention of the Democracy is correct, that the Court of Appeals can be overwhelmingly Democratic and still be nonpartisan, then, by the same argument, it must be equally true that the bench of the Court of Appeals might be exclusively Republican and still be nonpartisan. But the Democratic party has no stomach for nonpartisanship when it means the election of Republican judges or other officials. The Democracy, through persistent and long-continued partisanship, has succeeded in making practically the entire bench of Maryland Democratic. They now ask the Republicans of the Fourth Judicial Circuit to be nonpartisan in order that they may continue it so. At long intervals they will throw to the Republican party an associate judgeship in Baltimore city as a sort of sop or consolation prize, at times when they (the Democracy) are electing a number of judges of their own political faith. But when it comes to the Court of Appeals, that body must be Democratic from center to circumference. They seem to forsee that a time may come when the Democratic party may need this court of last resort, the highest tribunal in Maryland, to place the seal of judicial approval on disfranchisement legislation. It seems to be the fixed determination of the Democratic party to convert Maryland into a one-party State. All outward indications show that it is their settled purpose, so far as in their power, to abolish and destroy the Republican party in the whole State, just as they have succeeded in doing, in limited areas, by means of the infamous Wilson ballot law. They want, for their own purposes, what they call a "nonpartisan judiciary." But they want more than this. They want a nonpartisan State, for a State cannot be partisan unless it has at least two parties of fairly balanced influence. With this end in view, they came forward with the Poe amendment, and now with the Straus amendment. And once they are successful in forcing one of these wicked and sinister disfranchising amendments down the throat of the people, it will next become the duty of the Court of Appeals to pass upon and construe the measure. Considering the complete predominance of the Democracy in the present makeup of the Court of Appeals, can any reasonable person doubt what would be the decision of that tribunal on disfranchisement legislation, the pet measure of the Democratic party? A Democratic Court of Appeals will ratify Democratic election legislation in the future just as it has done in the past. No Republican who desires to see his party continue to exist as a potent living force in the State of Maryland can afford to give his vote to the nominee for high judicial office of the party whose chief aim and object is, at present, and for eight years past has been the destruction of the Republican party.

THE DEATH RECORD.

LEWIS YOMMER.

Died, at his home near Jennings, Saturday, September 11th, after a short illness, Lewis Yommer, aged nearly 43 years. The deceased leaves to mourn him a widow and six children.

HENRY YOST.

Henry Yost, one of the best known and most highly respected residents of Grantsville district, died at his home at Maple Grove, near Grantsville, Saturday evening, aged 76 years. Mrs. Yost preceded him to the grave two years ago. He is survived by three sons and two daughters.

WILLIAM WILDERSON.

The death of Mr. William Wilderson, at his home in District No. 8, occurred Monday morning at an early hour, after a long and painful illness, due to an injury to his leg, resulting in blood poison and the subsequent amputation of the injured member in order to at least prolong his life, which was fast ebbing away. Mr. Wilderson was a resident of Garrett county his entire lifetime of more than seventy-five years and was the father of a large family. His wife proceded him to the grave about a year ago. His funeral occurred from his late home Tuesday morning and was in charge of his nephew, Mr. S. H. Thompson, of Keyser, W. Va.

REGULAR DEMOCRATS NOMINATED TICKET

Mr. Thomas J. Johnson, of No. 9, the Senatorial Candidate.

The regular Democrats of Garrett county assembled in convention at the court house in Oakland yesterday afternoon and placed in the field a ticket—the pick of the adherents to that branch of the party, namely:

For State Senate, Mr. Thomas J. Johnson, of District No. 9.

For House of Delegates, Mr. Charles M. Miller, of Swanton, and Mr. Jacob J. Bender, of Grantsville.

For Sheriff, Mr. John T. Browning, of Oakland.

For County Treasurer, Mr. George J. Pool, of Kitzmiller.

For County Commissioners, Mr. William T. Stanton, of Grantsville, and Mr. Meshack Mattingly, of Hoyes.

For Clerk to County Commissioners, Mr. Francis Turner, of Swanton.

The nomination for Surveyor was left vacant.

The convention had as its chairman Mr. Charles M. Miller, and Mr. Charles A. Deffinbaugh, of Oakland, was the secretary.

The usual committees were appointed which reported, seating the delegates elected without a contest from any of the districts, all of which, with the exception of Nos. 3, 9 and 11, were represented. The committee on resolutions reported as follows:

The Democrats of Garrett county in convention assembled for the purpose of presenting to the voters of their county a ticket to be voted on the 2nd day of November, are animated by but one idea, viz: to present such names as will meet with the cordial endorsement of their party and of all conservative voters of the county. With this idea in view and animated by but one sole purpose, the future of our county, it is hereby

Resolved, That we endorse the Democratic administration of public affairs in Maryland and the platform adopted by the Democratic convention held in the city of Baltimore August 11th; and

Resolved, further, That we heartily endorse and pledge our support to the Constitutional amendment.

Resolved, That we are in favor of a revision of our present primary election law, especially that part which places a tax on delegates to conventions and candidates named by conventions.

Resolved, That as true Democrats we leave this, our preliminary work, to go to our homes and inspire our people with a firm resolve to carry our banner to victory.

Immediately after the adjournment of the convention the delegates attending it left town and no expression could be had concerning political conditions in other parts of the county, but it is pretty generally conceded that the ticket named will be wholly acceptable to the regular Democrats. This condition is counterbalanced, however, by the attitude of the anti-Browning forces, who are opposed to anything that has been or may hereafter be done by the regulars. Indeed, it is currently reported that one of the big moguls of the alleged people's propaganda made a proposition to Mr. Thomas J. Johnson, the Democratic Senatorial nominee, that the regular Democrats adjourn their convention until after the people's ticket is in the field and then the regulars endorse it. If this be true, and there is every reason to give credence to the report, it would be well for the dissatisfied Republicans to think twice before lending their assistance in placing a third ticket in the field which has for its sole object the furtherance of the interest of a branch of the Democratic party.

GORTNER.

Rev. E. Manges, of Oakland, preached a very interesting sermon at this place Sunday afternoon.

VISITS HIS BIRTHPLACE.

Rev. J. B. Shoup On His Way Home Stops at His Natal City.

To the Editor of The Republican:

During the month and more since I started on my trip westward from your mountain city, I have a hundred times tried to apply myself to the task of writing the promised letter, but in all that trying time I have not had one conscious minute free from suffering. Much of the time the agony has been about to the limit. How I have endured the 6,000 miles of travel I do not comprehend. It certainly seems a wonder to me that I did not "fall out by the way."

I am spending a few days here among beloved kindred, and on the spot where my eyes first saw the light more than 71 years ago. If all goes well I may see the hills of old Garrett before the week ends. Traveling wearies me much.

It will be an abiding grief all my remaining days to know that I was too ill to enjoy my trip westward. Certainly I saw wonders on the wide expanse of the middle west, mostly groaning under the burden of an unprecedented crop, farmers rolling in wealth, and towns growing like Jonah-vines. And the Rockies are a vast, bewildering wonder. Much of the time I could scarce lift my head from the pillow, and got only glimpses of "the wonderful works of God" as we sped along, but while memory lives I shall have a vivid impression of the stupendous task of world-building, as illustrated in the piles of rock heaped on rock, until the towering crags pierce the eternal blue.

Salt Lake City is a gem among the Wasatch hills, with bewildering wonders peeping out from every block. Mormonism is still a fact, but hardly needs to be reckoned with as a power. Brigham is dead, and the world has no successor to him. Smoot, politically, they told me, is dead. There will never be another of his kind in the United States Senate. Denver is a fairy-dream of 230,000. Kansas City is a giant of bad smells, and St. Louis is a monstrosity. Chicago is the "indescribable"—an aggregation of pride and pretention, of greed and grandeur, of wealth and poverty, of luxury and misery.

Powell-DeBerry Nuptials.

A beautiful wedding occurred at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Clark DeBerry on Wednesday, September 1, 1909, when their daughter, Edith, became the bride of Mr. Homer K. Powell, of Findlay, Ohio.

The ceremony was performed by Rev. J. B. Workman, of St. Paul's M. E. church, assisted by Rev. J. M. Davis, in the presence of a few of the relatives and friends of the bride.

The parlor had been beautifully decorated under the supervision of Miss Helen DeBerry, a cousin of the bride, and the happy pair made their vows in the midst of fern and golden rod. The wedding march was skillfully rendered by Miss Lois DeBerry, of Terra Alta, also a cousin of the bride. The bride, who was becomingly attired in white and carried a bouquet of bride's roses, was attended by her sister, Miss Mary, who wore pink and carried a large bouquet of pink carnations. The groom wore the conventional black and the groomsman, Mr. C. Vernon Hooten, of Rowlesburg, W. Va., was similarly attired. The ring bearer was Virginia N. DeBerry, a neice of the bride, and the bride was given away by her father.

Following congratulations refreshments were served to the forty guests present after which the couple took their departure, amidst showers of rice, on train No. 7 for Findlay, Ohio, the home of the groom.

From this place they will visit Niagara Falls and other points before returning to West Lafayette College where the groom is professor of science and mathematics and the bride was formerly teacher of French and German. The wedding presents, consisting of silverware, cut glass, china, linen, etc., were numerous and beautiful.

The happy couple have the best wishes of their friends for a long and happy wedded life.

THE VACANCY FILLED.

Mr. William J. Barnard Appointed to Orphans' Court Bench.

Tuesday Mr. William J. Barnard, of Bloomington, received his commission as chief judge of the Orphan's Court and was sworn into office by Mr. Tower, Clerk of the Circuit Court. Mr. Barnard immediately entered upon the discharge of his duties and presided with grace and dignity at the session of his court Tuesday.

FIGHT FOR POLITICAL RIGHTS.

Seldom has there been a campaign in which the various prominent issues dove-tailed as in the one now waging. The focusing of the fight will therefore be facilitated. Aside from the proposal for increase of the city representation, which the Democrats linked with the anti-suffrage amendment and which will stand as an issue of prime interest to Baltimoreans in view of the honesty of the Republican and the dishonesty of the Democratic positions, there is a close alliance between the suffrage and the Wilson law issues. If the Democrats were assured of the passage of the amendment they could make a merit of wiping the iniquitous law from the statue books. But they have no confidence that this will be the case and they will look with greatest amount of anxiety to the decision to be rendered by the Attorney General on the question of the validity of the Wilson law practices that was put up to the Governor by the Republican State Central Committee. With the amendment in force the Democrats would not need to have any tricky election devices. In the absence of such absolute control of the State they will require all the customary devices in order to keep in power.

It would therefore be in line with Democratic policy to have a deferment of the Wilson Law appeal until after the election. It then could die a natural death in case the Democrats succeeded with their amendment project and the election laws generally could be revised in a spirit of seeming virtue. The people very well understand the situation and certainly the Republican leaders are not unaware of the attitude of the Democratic mind. The hearing, however, on the Wilson law practices will be held this month and there will be every disposition on the part of the Republicans to have it pushed to a determination at the earliest possible date. Former Attorney General Bonaparte announces his purpose to appear before Isaac Lobe Straus on the fourteenth of this month to make an argument against the practice of the Democrats in some of the counties in using a heavy black line to denote their candidates on the ballots and the ignoring of the minority supervisors by the two Democrats of various county boards. As the case will be heard judicially by the Attorney General and counsel will appear on either side, it may be expected that no phase of the matter will be over looked.

The fight will be for political rights. The lack of a uniform ballot law, the practice of employing trick ballots and like maneuvers of the Democrats have brought wide discredit upon the party and has aroused the people to the necessity for having a change in the conditions. To the lay mind there seems to be no doubt but that the law against the employment of emblems is violated when a distinguishing line is made to do the duty of a party emblem. Certainly the very spirit and purpose of the law is thereby defeated. However, the plea of the lawyers is to be awaited and the decision of the Democratic official who will have the say whether or not such acts are in violation of the statues. If the partisan considerations could control the decision it is evident that this would be in favor of the Democratic party. But Mr. Straus will be acting not in the capacity of a partisan, but of a judge and will owe it to his reputation to keep the distinction clear. Of course it seems to be a psychological requirement of unusual magnitude to ask the author of the suffrage amendment to entirely divest himself of the partisan proclivities and to pass adversely upon a question that vitally affects the welfare of his party in the very direction of the proposed amendment. But whatever may be the Straus decision the fact remains that the people will not tolerate these practices. Should they be branded legal the gravest reflections would be passed upon the Democratic party in the passing a law that would give warrant to practices that are on a par with the very lowest expressions of political cunning. The people in the State would rise in wrath against the debaser of their political rights and sweep the party from their throne of power.

It would, therefore, seem to be good politics to decide the acts illegal and cast the odium upon the particular supervisors who have been guilty of their perpetration. Certainly, whether from political consideration of those of broad public justice, the decision against the practices would be a decision for the political righteousness. Shorn of the Wilson law and defeated in the matter of the amendment, the Democratic party would receive a staggering blow, but one that should prove salutary in ridding it of the malign influences that seek to perpetrate the most serious outrages by corrupting the political rights of the people.—Baltimore American.

"THE SUN GOES DOWN."

The Baltimore Sun after a long period of silence and "prayerful" consideration has announced its support of the Democratic ticket and platform including the disfranchising amendment. The Sun couldn't stand making it unanimous for that would have been the situation in Baltimore where the American, News and Star are all arrayed against the Democratic ticket and it plan of disfranchisement. Of course, the Republicans and those Democrats who are against the suffrage amendment would have been pleased to have had the solid support of the press of Baltimore, but it was too much to expect the leading Democratic newspaper to simply join in the chorus. The Sun supported President Taft last year and fortunately for the people of this State it has on many former occasions denounced the sham and hypocrisy of the Democratic ring and its cry of "negro domination." It may join that ring today and help to fasten ring control upon Maryland; it can lend its aid to an unholy scheme of disfranchisement and the violation of the Nation's Constitution; it may give its moral support to trick ballots whereby thousands of white men as well as colored men are today disfranchised by its silence during the past four or five years, but it cannot expect the people to hear it when for political purposes it talks one way at one election and exactly the reverse at another in a matter of principle. If there was no danger of negro domination a few years ago, there is no danger now. The Sun knows the ring and its use of negro prejudice to gain more power and it has told the story too often for it's readers to forget it now when it has capitulated, eaten its own words and joined forces with the enemies of free government in Maryland.

OUR SOUTHERN LETTER.

The Sage of Valhalla Joins the Night Riders—and Gets Stung.

I like to be in good company.

John Burroughs and Washington Irving have told of hunting the honey bee, and they both made very pretty stories of the experience.

As there is no law to prevent any other fellow from taking the same subject for an essay, this bit of history goes into print.

We were building a fence around the southwest pasture lot to keep the Valhalla farm cows from dropping over to visit with Wash McDound's cattle too often about milking time. Jasper, the Croatan, whose ancestors include Englishmen of Raleigh's lost colony, Indians, one or two African chiefs, some American buckskin stock and nobody knows what else, was getting out some posts by the of the swamp, and after he came up to the fence line I was nosing around down there to see how many more posts we needed and I saw a paper pined to a tree with wooden pegs.

On it was written:

"This tree belongs to J. Mayho, and whatever is in it.
Keep away from this bee tree.
Jasper Mayho."

"Where did you get that, Jasper," I asked him.

"Oh, I just done heard dem bees a hummin' and a tummin', and I looked up and dere dey was in two yards of me."

So Jasper asked if I had any objections to letting him cut the tree, and I told him to cut it any time. With due regard for the lords proprietors he informed me that a man on whose land the tree is found has a property right, according to custom, in the tree, and he suggested that I go along when he gathered the honey.

You wouldn't fly in the face of custom established for two or three centuries, would you?

So when Jasper cut the tree one rainy night I fell in with the boy of the house who is the big toad in every puddle on the plantation, and following with the Old Father Abraham, who ranks next to the clock about the place for reliability the being always ready to go, we went down into the darkness and and wet wood, armed with buckets, axes, a cross-cut saw, and a bee veil that the boy used when he works about the hives at the house.

It was dark enough when we reached the scene of action, but the bees had not gone to bed yet. A lot of them were hanging around out of doors, clustering near the entrance, which was not above four feet from the ground.

In the good old days the old daddies used to think so fine in the nair, when we cut a bee tree we took all kinds of luck. Now the boy of the house showed us some Yankee tricks.

He keeps a smoker to discourage the bees that want sting, and he fired that thing up with dead wood and old waste, and turned a stream of smoke on the bees at the enterance to the tree-hive for all the world like any modern bee proceeding. He smoked them until they said they had plenty, thanks, and went inside. Then two lusty-yeoman took the saw and sawed the tree down, and when it fell the boy with his smocker smoked at the bottom of the hollow tree and the bees said they perfered to stay inside.

Dreadfully tame and unromantic isn't it.

But the exciting part of the story did not begin with the arrival at the tree.

The honey hunters sawed a length from the tree and split it. The bees had been smoked farther up into the hollow. A hole was cut several feet up the trunk to permit them to escape into a hive that was set before the hole.

The fellows with the buckets got busy, and filled their vessels reasonably full of a complex mixture which looked some like rich earth from the garden. Then the artist who managed the smocker forgot himself and let his fire go out. He let it go out about the time the men with the saw cut another length from the tree.

Incidentally as the fire went out the bees followed the same movement.

Here and there bits of pitch pine had been lighted to make fires to help to see the work. The fires also helped the bees to see. They flew around to investigate things, and crawled in places they did not care to fly.

A bee has no genial disposition. Even in a wet, dark night he does not liven up in any sunshiny fashion. To be sure he is a villian under certain conditions, but like the mosquito, the meanest feature about him is that abominable threat. Analyzed and really tried out a bee sting is no worse than lots of other afflictions. But you let a dozen or so disgruntled bees get to buzzing round your ears and dodging in your face and jabing at your fingers, and you are either a philosophical old bee man or a wonderfully self-possessed man if you do not take to the trees.

That is about what the bee wants. If you stand still he seems to believe you not guilty. But start to run, and he looks on the movement as proof of the crime.

It was interesting to see Father Abraham and old Jasper stay at the hollow tree and dig out the honey and dirt and smashed bees, while the younger members of the outfit peeled their coats off, and fanned the air with their clothes.

Without a doubt hunting the honey bee is a pastorial and fascinating pursuit while you are chasing around among the flowers in the light of day trailing a bee from the flower to his lair. But when you have found where he stores his goods, and come to him in the night with a mask and a jimmy and attempt to do a job of amateur burglary, the tune changes.

The bee is a good fighter, and his style of team work is excellent. Like the colored troops of the Civil War, he never knows when to stop and he will fight long after the battle is over if he can find any of the enemy left.

By and by the tree was rifled. By the torchlights we picked a way through the wet grass and dripping trees until a road was reached, and there, by the midnight cheer of a smelling lantern, we divided the accumulations as far as they were divisible. Each fellow had his own wet feet and trousers, and the bee sting could not be portioned out so many to each head. But the dead bees, brood, and pollen and the rotten wood were more easily shared out.

Several quarts of honey were strained out the next day by all of the marauders, and in course of time the swelling went down; but right this minute, down at the hives below the shop, is ten times as much honey in good clean pound sections waiting until the bees have filled all the sections to be taken off without trouble and in shape to go directly to the table in the clean comb.

When you hunt the honey bee it is less trouble and more profit to go right down in the yard where the bee stands are, and I am not fooling you either.

Hunting it out in the woods is romantic. That is about all.

WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnificent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience; America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,000.00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements. These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and believe that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator is still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

Lesson XII.—Third Quarter, For Sept. 19, 1909.

THE INTERNATIONAL SERIES.

Text of the Lesson, a Comprehensive Quarterly Review—Golden Text, Acts xix, 20—Commentary Prepared by Rev. D. M. Stearns.

[Copyright, 1909, by American Press Association.]

LESSON I.—Paul's second missionary journey—Antioch to Philippi—Acts xvi, 6-15. Golden Text, Acts xvi, 9, "Come over into Macedonia and help us." The lessons of this quarter cover Paul's second and third missionary tours and illustrate the things that even to this day may befall the Spirit filled and Spirit sent servants of the Lord. Souls will be saved, companies of believers gathered, but there must be faithful and persistent seed sowing, patient waiting and absolute surrender to the Spirit's control and guidance.

LESSON II.—The Philippian Jailer, Acts xvi, 25-40. Golden Text, Acts xvi, 31, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved and thy house." A most unlikely convert, at a most unlikely time, in a most unlikely place, but thus God works, not as we would think or expect, but as He sees best, asking us to be willing to suffer with and for Him, who bore so much for us, and praise Him through it all, if only souls may be saved by seeing His power and believing in Him.

LESSON III.—Paul at Thessalonica and Berea, Acts xvii, 1-15. Golden Text, Ps. cxix, 11, "Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against Thee." Everywhere God works by His Spirit, through His word as Jesus is preached. The Spirit uses only His word as the means by which He accomplishes the will of God. The written word tells of the living word, and by the word God is revealed, even as the Lord revealed Himself to Samuel by the word of the Lord (I Sam. iii, 21).

LESSON IV.—Paul at Athens, Acts xvii, 22-34. Golden Text, John iv, 24, "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in Spirit and in Truth." The great adversary is content to let men worship any kind of a god and as many gods as they please if he can only keep them from knowing the one true God, the only Creator, Redeemer and Judge of all mankind.

LESSON V.—Close of Paul's second missionary journey, Acts xviii, 1-22. Golden Text, John xvi, 33, "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." God always has a "Be not afraid" for every one who is fearful, whether it be Abram or Isaiah or John or Paul or you, dear reader, whoever you are, if only you are a child of God by faith in Christ Jesus.

LESSON VI.—Paul's instructions to the Thessalonians, I Thess. v, 12-24. Golden Text, I Thess. v, 15, "See that none render evil for evil unto any man, but ever follow that which is good." In this probable first letter which he wrote we have a fair sample of all His instructions. Saved by the grace of God through the gospel of His Son, to serve Him and to wait for His Son from heaven, walking worthy of God while we wait for His kingdom.

LESSON VII.—Paul at Ephesus on his third missionary journey, Acts, xix, 8-20. Golden Text, Acts xix, 17, "The name of the Lord Jesus was magnified." This is the story of Paul's three years at Ephesus when through Him all who dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, and to make manifest the pre-eminence of that name over the evil one and all evil spirits God caused special miracles to be wrought through Paul.

LESSON VIII.—The riot at Ephesus, Acts xix, 23-30, 35-41. Golden Text, II Cor. xii, 9, "He said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness." When the name of the Lord Jesus is magnified and the word of God grows and prevails the adversary will surely show his wrath; hence this riot in the name of Diana of the Ephesians whom all Asia and the world worshipeth.

LESSON IX.—Paul on Christian love, I Cor. xiii, 1-13. Golden Text, I Cor. xiii, 13, "And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three, but the greatest of these is love." Consider how much that is outwardly good and praised by men may be in the sight of God as nothing. "That which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God" (Luke xvi, 15). The love of God, which is the greatest thing we ever heard of, must be known and believed and the Son of God received before any service can be acceptable to Him.

LESSON X.—Paul's farewell to the Ephesians, Acts xx 2-38. Golden Text, Phil. iv, 13, "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me." Having been to Greece and being now on his way to Jerusalem, he enters three farewell words. He magnified the gospel of the grace of God, the word of God, and on man's part faith and repentance.

LESSON XI.—Close of Paul's third missionary journey, Acts xxi, 1-17. Golden Text, Acts xxi, 14, "The will of the Lord be done." Services at Tyre, Ptolemais and Cesarea mark the close of this third great purpose in the name of the Lord Jesus, but the spoken ones to be noted seems to be his being forbidden by the Holy Ghost to go to Jerusalem (21, 24), and yet his determination to go thinking, no doubt, that it was simply the kindness of the brethren and their desire that he should not suffer unnecessarily.

E. S. WEST'S SEPTEMBER BULLETIN OF REAL ESTATE

Some Excellent Bargains Offered In Town and Suburban Property.

Mr. E. S. West, the Oakland real estate man, has issued a bulletin for September, in which he offers some rare bargains in town and suburban property.

Oakland's future is promising and an investment in real estate now will bring excellent returns. What Oakland is and what Oakland is to be, is set out in an article "Watch Oakland Grow," published elsewhere in this paper today.

Mr. West's September Bulletin reads as follows:

Dear Friend—

In sending you this partial list of valuable real estate for sale in this vicinity, we wish to call your attention to a circular gotten up by the local Board of Trade, and which is enclosed herewith.

I vouch for the truth of every statement contained therein, and invite you to investigate to your own satisfaction, the resources and many desirable features of this mountain top. My motto is, "My customers must be pleased," and if you fail to find in this partial list of bargains in real estate, what you are looking for, write me, describe what you want, the approximate cost, etc., and I am sure I can find it for you, as my clients have property listed which they do not desire advertised in a public way.

No. 1. 15 Acres in suburbs of Oakland, improved, with good 7-room house, barn, orchard, etc. For sale at $5,000 or for rent at $30 per month, furnished.

No. 2. Good new house of six rooms and a nice lot in desirable part of Oakland, for sale at $1650. This house is equipped for burning natural gas.

No. 3. Good 8-room house in suburbs of Oakland, acre and a half of ground, house could not be built for $3,000; will sell for $2,500.

No. 4. Suburban Home. 10 acres of best land in the country. Highly improved with 6-room house, barn, grainery, wagon shed, poultry house, two wells, orchard, etc. Worth $5,000 of any man's money. Can be had now for $3,700.

No. 5. Excellent home in southern suburbs of Oakland, 11 rooms, plenty of ground, fine shade trees, excellent spring, good views, can be had at a bargain, $5,200.

No. 6. Eight acres good land, 14-room house, and stable, in north suburb of Oakland. Most desirable place in the city. House is strictly modern, including bath room and equipped for burning natural gas, $9,000.

No. 7. 13-room house in Mt. Lake Park, two blocks from Auditorium. Worth $4,000. Owner has to sell and it can be bought, if taken soon, for $2,000.

No. 8. 100 acres near Deer Park, unimproved. Would make excellent farm land. Can be bought for $12.00 per acre.

No. 9. 118 acres half mile from Deer Park, excellent soil, 50 acres cleared. 200 apple trees just coming into bearing. Fair farm house, good springs, plenty of out-buildings, can be had for $3,500.

No. 10. 33 acres three miles west of Oakland, good farm house and stable. 12 acres cleared and fenced. Owner desires to go west. Will sell for $1,100.

No. 11. 22 acres improved, 1 mile from Oakland, ideal place for fruit and poultry farm. Excellent location for summer home. Fine spring of pure water. Will sell for $100 per acre

No. 12. 65 acres half mile out of Oakland. 45 acres cleared. Land lies smooth. Spring of absolutely pure water which could be piped into house. Abundant water at this spring for all farm purposes. Small stream flows through the place. Excellent building site. Ideal place for summer home or sanitarium. This property can be purchased for $100 per acre.

No. 13. 154 acres cleared and well fenced. Good improvements. Fine orchard excellent soil, large boiling spring of ice-cold water right at the house. This is a new farm and the soil which has been analyzed, is found to be the same as that of the best farms near Accident and Grantsville. I can sell this valuable property for $2,600, and there is not a foot of it but what modern farm machinery could be used on.

No. 14. 175 acres near Bittinger, one of the best farms in the locality. 8000 pounds of maple sugar manufactured on this farm this year. Farm lays well and is improved. Owner desires to leave the state and will sell this property for $4,000.

No. 15. Fine home. 9-room house, 19 acres of land, mostly cleared, near Brookside, W. Va. This property can be bought for less than the house cost. Would make a good summer home or poultry and fruit farm.

No. 16. 28 acres on Northwestern Pike, 9 miles south of Oakland. Good farm house, barn and orchard. A snap; $800. Land mostly cleared.

No. 17. Fine building lot in business portion of Oakland. Most desirable place for a modern hotel, which is badly needed, can be bought reasonable.

No. 18. 10-room house and lot. Hot water heat, bath, electric light, natural gas at the door, can be bought for $3700.

No. 19. Good business block near B. & O. depot in business center, ideal location for fine hotel, can be bought for $10,500.

No. 20. Good house and lot on Center street in desirable location. Can be bought if taken soon, for $1,500. Owner does not reside here and has to sell.

No. 21. Fine large home on Alder street known as the "Episcopal Rectory." One of the most desirable residential portions of the city. This property can be bought for $4,000.

No. 22. Corner lot on Sixth and Green streets. Quarter acre ground, nice oak trees, one of the best building lots in town. For sale at $700. Corner lot on Seventh and Oak streets at $550. Two lots on Oak street between Seventh and Eighth streets at $425 each or $800 for the two.

No. 23. Steam Bottling works. Good house and barn on a lot 225 by 200 feet. Excellent spring. For sale at $6,000.

No. 24. Good 8-room house. Acre and half ground. Half way between Oakland and Mt. Lake Park. Very desirable location. For sale at $2,500. House alone would cost $3,000 to build.

No. 25. Valuable farm of 51 acres known as "Morning Side." One mile south of Mt. Lake Park. Improved by good new 8-room house finished in hardwood. Has direct connection with the water works of Mt. Lake Park with a heavy pressure. Splendid bath, hot and cold water, cement cellar, 400 bearing fruit trees. Farm practically all cleared lays smooth. 250 foot poultry house, stable, grainery, etc. This property, if taken soon, can be had for $4,000; house alone cost that money. Perpetual water rights go with this farm.

No. 26. 152½ acres on the Cranesville public road, 4 miles west of Oakland. Good buildings, good fences, 50 fruit trees in bearing, about 50 acres cleared. School fourth mile from the house. Farm is well watered, lays practically level. Soil of wooded portion very rich and easily cleared. This farm in worth $4,500, can be bought, if taken this fall, for $2,700.

No. 27. 214 acres on Backbone mountain about one mile from Altamont and near the railroad. About 50 acres clear and under fence. Small house and outbuildings. Best spring in the country. Analyzed and found to be purer than the water shipped from Tr esdale Heights. Excellent location for sanitarium. Water from this spring alone would be worth thousands of dollars to any one who would ship it to the city. Tract has 75000 of saw timber and will cut 2000 ties. County road runs near the tract and a private road through the place. Would make an ideal sheep or grazing farm and can be bought for $1500.

No. 28. 100 acres on the B. & O. railroad near the town of Hutton in a high state of cultivation. 80 acres cleared. 8-room house, 125 bearing fruit trees. Uncleared portion has, approximately, 100,000 feet in sawtimber. Farm is well watered and free from debt. 80 tons of hay cut on the farm this year. Can be bought if taken this fall for $4,500.

No. 29. 18 acres half mile south of Mt. Lake Park, 6-room house, cellar, stable, two good springs, very productive, all cleared and well fenced. Will sell for $2,200.

No. 30. 25 acres four miles from Oakland on Broad Ford Run, 12 acres cleared, good 8-room house, some fruit and berries. Good barn and excellent water. For sale at $1500.

No. 31. 100 acres near Loch Lynn, adjoining farm of Sampson Bittinger, 50 acres cleared, fair buildings, good orchard, land smooth and productive. $500 worth of timber on the place. Will sell for $3,500.

No. 32. 47 acres near Dobbin, W. Va., located on Mason road leading to Oakland. 5-room house, fair out-building, 75 bearing apple trees, choice fruit, 25 acres cleared. Good lime quarry; coal open, one mile for from house. One half mile to school. Will sell for $1000. Mineral rights reserved.

No. 33. Two good dwelling houses in the town of Deer Park. Property of Mrs. J. L. Fitzwater and M. E. George. For sale at $1300.

No. 34. 20 acres of ground. Fine two-story brick house, tenant house, barn, etc., in town of Deer Park. For sale at $7,500. House alone is worth that money and the land is very valuable as town lots or for farming purposes.

No. 35. 12½ acres. 10 minutes walk from Post Office in Oakland. 5-room house, good well, some out-buildings, excellent cut stone cellar. Can be had for $900.

No. 36. 209 acres near Accident. Most excellent farm land. 160 acres cleared, fine stone spring house, good trout fishing, coal on the farm. Sugar camp that will set 1200 vessels. This farm can be had, if taken this fall for $6,000.

No. 37. 122 acres six miles south of Oakland. Hill land, very good orchard 50 acres cleared, good coal mine open on the place. Will sell the coal for $2,000 or the farm including the mineral rights for $3,000.

No. 38. 15-room house with seven acres of ground, good orchard, stable, ect., in the city of Oakland near Highland Park. For sale at $6,500.

No. 39. 50 acres valuable oak timber a mile and a half south of Oakland for $1,000.

No. 40. 2200 acres most valuable timber land in this part of the country. 842 in fee, balance in timber rights only. Land underlaid with lime stone which was optioned at $25 per acre before the last panic. Best logging proposition, practically all down hill. One-half mile from railroad station. 24 mile railroad charter to go with property. Twenty years to remove the timber. Timber composed of 60 per cent oak. Will cut in the neighborhood of 8000 feet per acre. About 3000 feet of poplar to the acre. About 6000 acres of good timber lies behind this tract that will have to come through it. This could be purchased as needed. The price of this 2200 acre tract is $30 per acre.

No. 41. 50 acres smooth land 1 mile west of Hutton on the B. & O. railroad and only 5 miles west of Oakland. 40 acres cleared and under a high state of cultivation. Small farm house, new bank barn 35 by 42 feet. Other outbuildings, a few young fruit trees, land underlaid with coal. Will sell this farm, if taken quick, for $3,000.

No. 43. 9-room house, 1 acre ground in Oakland, nice fruit trees, grapes, two barns, good well of water, good stone cellar, gas line right by the door. $3,000.

No. 44. 500 acres excellent farm land near Swallow Falls. 200 acres cleared, two orchards, fine big farm house and necessary out-building. Place is well watered and an excellent spring of cold water piped to the house. Coal opened on the place. Finest veins of fire clay and white kaolin in the U. S. Fire clay was optioned at $35 per acre at time of late money panic. Railroad is projected by this farm and will no doubt be built soon.

No. 45. 341 acres, 12 room house, barn 40 by 80 feet, all other necessary out-building, excellent young orchard, this farm is level and in high state of cultivation, will cut $2,000.00 worth of hay, fine ice cold spring by the house, buildings are new. This farm is just across the railroad from Mt. Lake Park and one mile from Oakland. It is all cleared but about fifty acres. If this farm were mine I would not exchange it for an equal number of acres anywhere in the U. S. I have been all over the United States and know what I am talking about. It is positively worth twice what is asked for it. Come and see this farm that I am offering for $18,000.

I have for sale some of the best farming lands in the state of South Dakota and other western states and will be glad to furnish you information regarding location, prices, etc. If interested in any of the above propositions or coal and timber land, call on or write,

TOWN IMPROVING TIPS

Suggestions by the Winner of a Boosting Contest.

GET A PUBLICITY COMMITTEE.

Washington Man Advises the Organization of One at Once—The Power of Printer's Ink—Novel and Sensational Schemes Not Favored.

The Washington Post has been carrying on a contest for the best written plan for boosting the Capital City. The award was given to Mr. Louis Reilly of Washington, and as his ideas may be made to apply in part to other cities and towns they are herewith reproduced in part:

1. Publicity Committee.—The first thing to do is to organize a publicity committee, chosen from among such citizens as the members of the chamber of commerce and the board of trade and having for object the promotion of the development of the city.

2. Ways and Means.—As soon as this committee has a local habitation, a name and a clerk it should hustle to take up a collection. It should call on all bankers, real estate dealers, hotel keepers, railroad men, merchants, etc., to contribute to a publicity fund.

3. Bureau of Information.—The committee should next proceed to gather data concerning eligible manufacturing sites, shipping facilities, freight charges, factory help, rate of taxation, water and all other matters concerning which persons contemplating moving to this city would like to know.

4. Wanted, a Writer.—An expert writer should be employed to set forth the advantages of Washington. His style should be clear, vivid, terse. He should do his best to "write up" the city in a story cut to the quick.

5. The Folder.—There is no advocate so powerful as printer's ink. It is magnetic and convincing. Its eloquence lasts. It says just what is wanted to be said. It goes everywhere. It repeats its argument over and over again. Night is the same as day to it, and all seasons are summer. It is everlastingly "on the job." The chief agent of the publicity committee in advertising the city must be a folder. This pamphlet should be artistically printed on paper of fair quality.

6. Sowing the Seed.—The publicity committee will take hold of the boom again and scatter that pamphlet where it will do the most good. Copies of it should be placed in the Union station, in hotels, on steamboats, etc. It could be mailed to boards of trade and to members of the manufacturers' associations. It could be put on sale at cost or at a trifle above cost and so be widely distributed, yet not exhaust the money of the committee.

7. Advertising an Advertisement.—A "spot light" ad. of that folder should be inserted in some of the leading trade journals, especially in the organs of those industries that could be profitably carried on in this neighborhood. By this means news of the folder will spread in shops, factories and mills; thereby business men who are looking for a new site for their enterprises will be attracted hither to prospect the promised land.

8. The Leaflet.—For the sake of economy and convenience a tract should be prepared to prevent the wasting of the folder by injudicious distribution and also to still further advertise it. This leaflet should have on one side a summary of the most striking advantage of Washington as a commercial center and on the other a brief list of its charms as a place of residence.

The leaflet should end with the statement that the folder, giving fuller details, could be had for (?) cents at publicity headquarters and that the committee would be glad to give any additional information desired. This leaflet should be put in all letters written by Washingtonians to outsiders.

9. Excursions and Conventions.—The publicity committee will make a systematic endeavor to bring excursions and conventions hither from every city in the whole country.

10. Celebrations.—The committee should devise attractions to draw crowds and to give folk at a distance an extra reason for making a trip to Washington. It should celebrate the anniversaries of the most memorable events in the history of the capital, hold a semiannual fair, have a homecoming week, etc.

11. A Great Hall.—The publicity committee will continue to agitate the question of building here a great convention hall.

12. Other Means.—No pentup Utica will confine the activities of the publicity committee. The foregoing ways of booming the city will be its fundamental reliance, but it will at seasonable times utilize other feasible methods to achieve the same purpose. Novel and sensational schemes are not wanted. They are not effective. They are not business. They do not produce results. They will not attract permanent residents nor add to the number of our commercial enterprises. But, indeed, there is no need for freak plans. The city's advantages are too actual for buncombe or claptrap. What is required is the most efficacious way to make them known.

The city, the committee and the folder are a trio sure to triumph. In the last analysis the committee's the thing. It is the living force behind the wheels of the "boom." It is the alpha and the omega of the movement. On the industry, intelligence, enthusiasm and perseverance of its members will the success of any plan to advance the progress of the city depend. If the right sort of men are chosen the work will be well done.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc.

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated aoout one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. Address Dr. Percival Lantz, Alaska, W. Va. 7-tf

SUIT ENTERED BY GILMOR S. HAMILL.

On Saturday morning last the editor of THE REPUBLICAN was served with a summons to answer the suit of Gilmor S. Hamill in the Circuit Court for Garrett county. The record fails to disclose the nature of Mr. Hamill's complaint, but it is currently reported that his grievance arises out of a news article which appeared in the last issue of THE REPUBLICAN giving an account of Mr. Hamill's connection with the so-called "People's Party" movement.

We suppose Mr. Hamill, whenever the notion strikes him, has the right to bring suit, as the Courts of Maryland are open to all of her citizens to right their wrongs whenever and wherever they will, but sometimes some of her citizens resort to the courts for supposed and imaginary grievances, and they afterwards find out that they have not been wronged at all.

THE REPUBLICAN has not libeled Mr. Hamill, and has not made itself or its owner liable to Mr. Hamill in this instance, but we suppose it will require the verdict of the court to convince the gentleman that he has misconceived his rights in this matter.

If Mr. Hamill is trying to run a "bluff" he will find that he will be "called." If he has brought his suit for the purpose of giving vent to his personal animosity towards the editor of THE REPUBLICAN, the sooner the case is brought to trial the sooner the people of the county will know the cause for this outbreak.

We court a legal investigation of the causes of Mr. Hamill's complaint.

If Mr. Hamill thought to close the mouth of this paper with his suit he has simply counted without his host, for since he has assumed a leading part in this new political propaganda which is afflicting a few people in Garrett county, he must expect criticism of his public and political acts, and we give him notice here and now that we shall continue to criticise such acts and conduct on his part, in a fair and justifiable way, even if he sees fit to bring suit against us once a week from now until this time next year, and we shall try to take care of the liability attached to our acts.

BENJ. H. SINCELL,
Editor THE REPUBLICAN.

THE AMENDMENT AND THE FOREIGN-BORN VOTER.

Opponents of the disfranchising amendment will be glad to learn that the Democratic organization proposes to adopt a slogan for the campaign reading. "The suffrage amendment will not disfranchise any white voter in the State, native or foreign-born," and that the Democratic committees will imprint this sentiment upon all campaign literature, tickets to meetings and letter-heads. For one thing, it will be a positive admission by the authorized representatives of the party that drew the amendment and passed it through the Legislature of the discrimination intended That evidence might be useful if by any hook or crook the amendment should be approved by the people and should go to the United States Supreme Court for a decision as to its constitutionality.

But the slogan is a good one—for the enemy—for other reasons. Foreign-born voters will at once be impressed with the fact that it says "any white voter" and does not say "any white man." Election day this year falls on the 2d day of November. Every foreign-born citizen whose term of residence in this country is such that he would be qualified to register on the 3d of November, or thereafter, will be disfranchised unless he can pass the all-but-impossible memory test provided. Every foreigner who comes to this State hereafter will be disfranchised unless he can pass the test. Moreover, the provisions of the amendments regarding the affidavits which must be made both by native and foreign-born citizens, designating as perjury any willful misstatement of fact, will have the effect of restraining some citizens who have not absolute information as to the status of their ancestors from swearing to their belief that they are entitled to register and vote.

The formation of anti-amendment associations by foreign-born voters, the statement issued by the non-partisan Independent Citizens' Union and other developments prove that the foreign-born voter is fully alive to the situation.

THE family tree sometimes bears pretty poor fruit.

The Undesirable Element in Maryland Politics.

To the Editor of The Republican:

In last week's issue of the Mountain Democrat there was published over the signature, "A Frederick Citizen," an article in which the writer reaches the limit of absurd and faulty argumentation in his plea in behalf of the proposed suffrage amendment.

Knowing the vital importance of this question to your readers as well as to every citizen of the county and state, and knowing also that the actual purport of the proposed amendment does not depend upon the statements of campaign writers or speakers, we believe that every voter should carefully study the history, general structure and possible operation of the amendment itself and thoroughly analyze, in the light of fairness, every argument produced in favor or against its adoption.

For example, we will examine the two leading statements in the article published in the Mountain Democrat, as above referred to. The writer asserts that the real purpose of the amendment is to eliminate the undesirable element from Maryland politics. That statements carries with it the unavoidable conclusion that there is an element in the politics of the state which is distasteful to some one. It is necessary next to discover to whom this element is undesirable, and when we find that the amendment came out of the heart of the Democratic party, it is self evident that the element was undesirable to the Democratic party, since there originated the scheme to eliminate it. Therefore the only conclusion to be reached is that the purpose of the proposed amendment is to eliminate from Maryland politics an element which is distasteful to the Democratic party.

In the article under consideration the writer states that the negro is the undesirable element in Maryland politics. Can this be true when all men may know that the Democratic party was conceived, brought forth and reached maturity in the heart of the black man's country. Her first step left a tiny foot print in the sands that burned beneath a southern sun, and today in her decrepid old age she wanders about the scenes of her childhood and finds her only consolation, in the days of her decline, the fidelity of the boasted solid south, and it is true that where the negro is most numerous the democracy is the strongest; but a closer study will be to the point.

Were it the aim of the proposed amendment to eliminate the colored vote from politics, the educational test and property qualification specified in that measure, would be applicable only to colored voters, but since these tests are applicable to more than the colored voter and since it is an absolute fact that there are hundreds of negro votes cast in the state, in favor and support of the Democratic party, and since the history of that party shows that it has always been anxious to acquire votes and ask no question as to whether or not the voter is a white man, a black man or even a dead man, we are forced to believe that the aim of the amendment is not to disfranchise the colored voters in the Democratic party, nor to disfranchise the negro voter alone in the Republican party.

Again, an element that favors and strengthens a party could not be distasteful to that party. It therefore follows that an element which is undesirable to a political party must be an element which opposes that party. What is it in Maryland politics which opposes the Democratic party and threaten its dethronement? It is unquestionably the Republican party and its recent growth. Thus we see that the undesirable element in Maryland politics, undesirable to the Democratic party, is not the negro, but the Republican voters without regard to color, creed or condition. The situation, then, is briefly summed up in the statements that there is an element in Maryland politics which is undesirable to the Democratic party, and that distasteful element is the Republican voter and taking the Democrats' own statement that the suffrage amendment aims to eliminate this element, we declare it to be a dangerous measure and while its ardent advocates are declaring that it will save the people of Maryland from the awful horror of negro domination all may be sure that it is an ingenious plan to inflict upon the people the far more terrible scourge of Democratic domination and un-American tyranny.

No true Republican can support a scheme so fraught with evil consequences and we trust that no nominal Republican will endanger his own right of suffrage by voting for the adoption of this amendment, and we also believe that no honorable and fair minded Democrat will soil his own conscience and the honor of his party by supporting a movement so distasteful to every true American citizen, regardless of political views and preferences.

BROADWATER DAY IN GARRETT COUNTY

Eight Hundred of the Clan Attended Reunion.

Saturday was Broadwater day in Garrett county. The reunion held at Merrill Grove was one of the most remarkable events in the county. The weather was ideal and nothing interfered to prevent the Broadwaters from gathering at Merrill's Grove. A conservative estimate of the number present is 800. Fully 90 per cent. of them were Broadwaters.

The day was given up to social enjoyment, vocal and instrumental music. The eatables were in enormous quantities and it seemed as if all the chickens in Garrett county had been slaughtered for the occasion. Visitors were welcomed with genuine country hospitality, and introduced to the roast chicken and "fixin's" at once.

D. R. Sloan, of Lonaconing, and Lawrence F. Green of Garrett county, were the orators of the occasion. The history of the Broadwaters was reviewed. Messrs. Sloan and Green related some interesting facts in the history of the Broadwaters.

About the year 1807 four brothers, Charles, William, Guy and Samuel Broadwater, immigrated from Loudon county, Va., to Allegany county, Md., and settled where their descendants now reside. Their progeny is numerous. Charles, the eldest, had eight sons and daughters; one of the sons, Amos, married Sarah Sigler. Of that union 12 children were born and all are living today and were present at the reunion. They are: Mrs. Henry Green, aged 83; William, 81; John, 80; Mrs Jefferson Green, 78; Jefferson, 74; Mrs. Simon Green, 71; Mrs. Peter Bittinger, 70; Amos, 66; Mrs. Jacob Blocker, 64; David, 62; Mrs. Peter Stevens, 59, and Eli, 57. The sire died six years ago, aged 97. He left 12 children, 98 grandchildren, 111 great-grandchildren, and a regiment of great-great-grandchildren.

Saturday's gathering was a magnificent demonstration of the sturdy vitality of these stalwart sons of the fearless pioneers who conquered the wilderness, and after long years of unrelenting toil left their children in possession of the land which they had redeemed.

Relative of North Point Hero.

A most interesting character is Dr. J. Lee McComas, of Oakland, Md., who is spending a few days at the Eutaw House. He is a relative of that young Baltimore hero who, with Wells, is said to have shot General Ross at North Point. Dr. McComas was formerly an assistant surgeon in the United States Army. After his graduation in 1858 he began practice at Berkeley Springs, W. Va., and later at Oakland, where he was physician in attendance at the Oakland and Deer Park Hotels. He was a friend of the late John W. Garrett, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. He attended some of the greatest men of their times who were guests at the famous hotels. He is a native of Baltimore.

"When I went to Berkeley Springs and later to Oakland," said Dr. McComas, "it was a wild country and sparsely settled. Deer were plentiful. The wild cat had not yet disappeared from the mountains. Our lives were hardy, but healthy and happy. I have seen great changes take place in my time, but that would be a long story."

Henry McComas, a relative of Dr. McComas, was shot by the British under command of General Ross. Dr. McComas was the attending physician at the bedside of Jefferson Davis when he was an United States senator. He has also attended Harrison, when he was in the United States Senate, and is the proud possessor of a cup and saucer donated to him by Mrs. Harrison, with the name, Caroline H. Harrison, engraved on it.

Dr. McComas has traveled extensively. His son, Dr. Henry W. McComas, took up his father's practice at his retirement. For many years Dr. McComas, senior, was a surgeon of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.—Baltimore American.

RYAN'S GLADE.

Not seeing any items from this section for quite a while in your valuable columns, we thought to try our pen and inform you of some of the happenings.

There will be an illustrated lecture in our church next Thursday evening, subject "The Life of Christ."

A number of our young ladies have gone from among us to teach school. Miss Ida Harvey will teach the Stoyer school; her sister, Miss Dessa, will teach the Bethlehem school, while Miss Mabel Neville teach at Wilsonia. Our school is under the direction of Miss Hennen of Deer Park.

Messrs. Frank and Stanbert Ashby, of Crellin, were calling on friends in this section Saturday and Sunday.

Mrs. J. B. Shockey and two children were visiting relatives at Stoyer last Saturday and Sunday.

Saturday evening was a red letter day in the memory of a number of our our young people. About twenty-one in all marched to the wooded glade near the residenee C. S. Thompson and there felled two bee trees, the trees having been previously located by Arthur Harvey. Oh my! how we did eat honey. After we had eaten all we wanted about sixty pounds were carried home in buckets. Many expression were made about the business tact of the bee.

Messrs. Arthur Harvey and Erwin Neville were calling on Misses Nora and Nina Steyer Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Ney Harvey and his family were visiting Mr. and Mrs. N. B. Harvey Sunday.

Mr. Asa Calis and some of the fair sex of Mt. Lake Park were in our midst Sunday.

Jack Frost did some damaging work in this section last week.

The oats crop in this section is a light one.

Politics is the topic of the day.

ASHER GLADE.

Mr. Geo. W. Vansickle was drilling wheat for several of the farmers last week.

The weather is cool for this time of the year, and we had one frost but it did no damage to the crops.

Mrs. Nancy Percy, of Mt. Braddock, Pa., is visiting relatives in this vicinity.

Wm. L. Thomas left here last Sunday for Swallow Falls, where he will have charge of the public school for the coming winter.

The Connecting Telephone Co. held a meeting on Saturday night and attended to considerable business.

Mr. A. J. Burgess and family were pleasant callers at W. H. Thomas' a short time ago.

Almost the entire community have had colds at this writing. CATER.

BITTINGER.

The village school opened last Monday morning with Prof. J. C. Beahm in charge, and the enrollment for the first day was thirty-two. This favorable opening seems to indicate an unusually successful school year here.

The Democratic primary election held here last Monday afternoon was rather sparingly attended. When the hour for opening the polls was at hand it was discovered that the ballot boxes had gotten mixed, the box intended for Accident having been sent to this place. Horses were immediately gotten out and as speedily as possible the error was corrected and the ballot boxes exchanged and all went off satisfactorily.

A valuable cow, belonging to C. E. Ellithorp, of this village, ate too freely of young clover on last Saturday morning and as a result died a few minutes after she was driven from the field.

Simon Orendorf, of Springs, Pa., spent last Saturday night and Sunday with his parents here.

Prof. J. C. Beahm and family have moved to this place and are occupying the Sechler house owned by Perry Broadwater.

Jonas Bittinger made a business trip to Accident last Monday afternoon and reports business as rather brisk in that town.

Mrs. Winterburg and daughter, Miss Christina, of Grantsville, spent last Saturday and Sunday with relatives here.

Mrs. G. W. Engle and children, who spent several weeks with relatives in this section, returned to their home in Baltimore last Saturday.

Messrs. Frank B. Palmer and Edward E. Sollars, Jr., left Oakland Monday for their respective schools, the former going to the Maryland Agricultural College, while the latter went to Baltimore Medical College, where he will complete his studies next year.

Farm for Sale.

I offer my farm in District No. 4 for sale. It contains 172 acres, one-third under fence and about forty acres cleared. About 250 bearing apple trees and 10 pear trees are on the place. Well watered and is two and a-half miles from the B. & O. R. R. About 200,000 feet of oak timber and 1,000 ties may be cut from the woodland Terms will be made to suit purchaser,

WHAT I CAN DO

Facts For The Republican Taxpayers.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Having announced myself as a candidate for the Senate, it is in order for me to explain what I will do when I get there

If any other gentleman in Garrett county, regardless of party politics, can show that he is better qualified and equipped to carry out the following promises, in the interest of the taxpayers and the people generally, I will promptly step down and out and help to elect him in my place.

In the first place I assert most positively, that if I had been summoned duces tecum with my maps, plats, abstracts of titles, and other data, along with Alexander C. Mason, surveyor, as witnesses, in the case of Garrett county versus the Consolidated Coal Company, the case would have been decided the other way entirely. I positively know this to be a fact beyond successful contradiction.

The result of such a decision would have been a saving to the state of over $15,000 in state taxes annually. Also a saving to Allegany county of $75,000 in taxes annually, and a saving to Garrett county of over $20,000 in taxes annually. I still possess the necessary data to prove these statements, in any court of justice, and I challenge a fair and full investigation of the facts in my possession. Furthermore my data and knowledge of the inside facts will forever end the notorious boundary dispute between Allegany and Garrett counties.

Furthermore, if elected to the Senate, I can secure the passage of my "amendments," to the charters of the companies I represent that were defeated two years ago. With these amendments passed it will be only a short time until you will see electric railways built from Deer Park to Uniontown and Pittsburg; also a branch from Miller's run to Grantsville and Meyersdale, via Cherry Creek, Bittinger, Jennings, etc. Also a branch from Cherry Tree Meadows to Accident and the Cove, thus opening up the entire Flatwoods settlement.

I frankly put these promises down in black and white, so that I can be held to their literal fulfillment hereafter, if I am elected to the Senate this winter.

Respectfully yours,
HIRAM P. TASKER.

Dedication Services.

The new Methodist Episcopal church at Jennings, this county, will be dedicated on Sunday, September 26th, 1909. The Rev. Dr. R. B. Ward will preach the dedicatory sermon at 10:30 a. m. on the above date. All are cordially invited to attend. A special invitation to all former pastors of the Grantsville circuit.

D. A. FRIEND,
Pastor.

Rev. and Mrs. Hawes, of Louisville, Ky., who have been in Oakland for a week as guests at the Commercial Hotel, returned to their home yesterday. Sunday night Mr. Hawes preached in the Oakland Presbyterian church to an attentive and appreciative audience.

Miss Rose McGraw, sister of Hon. John T. McGraw, of Grafton, in attempting to alight from her carriage at the station in Oakland last Sunday afternoon, tripped over the wheel of the wheel of the vehicle and fell to the ground. Miss McGraw was somewhat bruised and suffered a painfully sprained ankle. She was attended by Dr. McComas.

Mr. J. D. McCubbin, B. & O. real estate agent, in response to a letter from the Oakland Board of Trade committee on advertising, came to Oakland yesterday morning where he was in conference during the forenoon with that committee discussing matters of mutual interest. Mr. McCubbin's visit may result in bringing the people of Oakland and the B. & O. authorities to a better understanding regarding existing conditions and will be of benefit to the residents of Oakland and the railroad as well.

A meeting of the Republican committee and the candidates of the Republican party in this county, was held in Oakland last Saturday when the preliminary work of arranging for the campaign, which will be active after October 1st, was mapped out. The meeting was attended by all the candidates with the exception of Mr. W. M. Lowdermilk, of Selbysport, who was under the impression that the meeeting was to have been held the day previous and who was in Oakland that day but was compelled to return to his home the same evening.

Mr. Joseph E. Harned, who has been contemplating a visit to New England cities for some time, left Oakland Tuesday night for Baltimore, where he will remain a day or two on business and then sail for Boston, Mass., in which city he will be the guest of Prof. F. S. Matthews, the eminent naturalist and botanist, whose lectures will be remembered by many who attended them at the teachers' training school in Oakland last spring. Mr. Harned will also visit Cambridge and Harvard University, where he will remain a day or two as the guest of Prof. Morris K. Turner, who is taking a special course of study there.

Commissioners' Meeting.

OFFICE OF THE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS FOR GARRETT CO., OAKLAND, MD., September 15, 1909.

The County Commissioners for Garrett county will meet at their office in Oakland on Tuesday, October 5, 1909, to transact any business that may be brought before them.

By order of the Board,
A. G. ROSS, Clerk.

STOYER.

Here we come again to give you a few more items from our village-town.

Cant. White was seen in town Tuesday morning on his way to Gormania.

Mr. W. H. Riley, of Tunnelton, W. Va., spent Monday evening with friends here.

Mr. G. N. Steyer left Tuesday for Blooming Grove, Tex., where he will occupy the chair of English in the University Training School.

Mr. Henry Harper, of Three Fork, is still near town.

Mr. Chas. Kidd made a flying trip to Gortner last week.

Our school opened Monday with an enrollment of sixteen pupils. We hope for a successful term.

Mrs. J. B. Shockey and family were visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. T. Steyer last Saturday and Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. Dowden Boyles made a business trip to Oakland Tuesday.

Miss Lydia Steyer, who has been staying with her uncle, W. T. Steyer, returned to her home near Kearney last Sunday.

Miss Grace Riley and Mr. Chas. Kidd are expecting to attend an illustrated lecture at White church Thursday evening.

The Wooing of Wilhelmina.

By Cecily Allen.

Copyrighted, 1908, by Associated Literary Press.

Of Wilhelmina's taste in dinner giving and the quality of her hospitality there could be no question. The first was above reproach; the second, like that of mercy, was not strained.

Of Wilhelmina's ability as an artist, however, there was very grave question indeed. Those who had no desire to defer to her dinners were very apt to pronounce her pictures daubs, which will explain why Dobson drew Remington aside and reviewed the situation. Dobson was taking Donald Remington, who had just returned from a year in England, to enjoy one of Wilhelmina's Sunday night dinners.

"You see, she hasn't had a fair chance yet, but she's awfully ambitious, and we all have hopes."

Remington nodded understandingly. He knew the type of artist, though the rosy colors in which Dobson had painted the dinner prospective had rather confused him.

"They lived on a farm—her folks had all kinds of money, blooded stock and all that—and they sent her to boarding school. You know how those finishing schools kill one's style."

"I WANT TO BE YOUR TEACHER," HE SAID GENTLY.

"From finishing school to studio, eh?"

"Not much. You mustn't make any mistake. She isn't exactly a spring chicken. She'll never see thirty again. But we call her Wilhelmina because she likes it—makes her feel as if she was one of us."

"So does art defer to appetite," murmured Remington as he lighted a fresh cigarette.

"Well, you wait. She went back home from school and took care of both the old folks till they died, three weeks apart. Then she sold out everything in Indiana and set up her studio here in New York. She's brought along a lot of the family heirlooms, mahogany, hand woven stuff and all that, and it's the greatest spot ever"—

"How about her pictures?" interrupted Remington good humoredly.

"Well, say, you want to be careful about those. She took the correspondence course in art after she went home, and you know what that means. She's an impressionist, and"—

"Never mind harrowing details. I am prepared for the worst."

Three minutes later he was standing, stricken dumb, in a most gracious presence. As he looked into her clear gray eyes, well set beneath a broad white forehead, he remembered having seen just one such face in his busy life. It was the face of an Englishwoman of title, whose peculiar gifts as a mother had made her greatly beloved of men.

"Did any one ever tell you how much you resemble the Countess of W.?" he demanded suddenly.

Wilhelmina flushed faintly and shook her head.

"You are so English that you don't seem to belong here at all!"

"Oh, but I do belong here, and I'm every inch American. I have a latchkey of my very own—and no English girl has that."

All during dinner Remington watched his hostess curiously. She seemed so utterly out of place among her guests, harmless, irresponsible chaps, hanging on the ragged edge of art's prosperity, ungroomed girls with enormous mops of hair and yellowed fingers which spoke of the cigarette habit.

"Looks like a Madonna among a bunch of dime museum freaks. It's a shame to spoil a good house mother to make a poor artist. Gad, what taste she had in haugings and fittings!"

For Remington was an architect and a good one. He could size up the refinement and true artistic instinct as stamped on a house, irrespective of cost or pretense, and he knew that so far as homemaking was concerned Wilhelmina Stevens was an artist.

Perhaps that was why, when he caught his first glimpse of her canvases, he almost groaned aloud.

"Those arches are wonderfully true," he heard Dobson explain, and he knew that the boy had picked out the one best point in what he felt was a landscape gone on a Saturday night's spree.

The pathos of her pose was to him fairly fascinating. Often after that he came to the studio, and always his heart sank within him as he realized how absorbed and determined was this lovable, young-old woman. She reminded him of a family friend who would sit enraptured at grand opera or concert and yet who could never strike a single true note or carry a tune and who wept because singing her babies to sleep was a boon denied.

Remington dropped in to see Wilhelmina oftenest when he was sure of finding her alone. He avoided her dinners and teas and chafing dish suppers. He found Wilhelmina's society a real inspiration in his work, for Remington had a mission. He wished to transplant to the suburbs of New York the love of old English architecture which he had absorbed during his year in the English provinces. And Wilhelmina not only appreciated English architecture, but she seemed instinctively to grasp its fundamental principles.

Remington had not dared to tell her how much he had depended upon her working out his plans for the cottage contest in the "ladies' round the year guest." That was why, with triumph lightening his heels and brightening his eyes, he rushed into her studio one stormy March day, the letter of supreme importance held aloft. And Wilhelmina sprang up abruptly from the mass of pillows on her divan and tried bravely but ineffectually to hide her tears.

Remington stopped, joy freezing on his lips at sight of her obvious grief.

"Wilhelmina, what has happened? Tell me at once."

"Daniels sent me home—told me to pack up my brushes and go away. His class was not for such as I."

The wretched truth was out. Daniels, whose special course at the academy was for the chosen few, the few with money to pay, had turned her out, money or no money. Like many a genius, he declined to teach those who gave no promise.

And Remington realized bitterly that the blow had been doubly hard because of the false hopes raised in this woman's heart by those who had feasted at her board.

Like a flash from the skies came his inspiration.

"I am sorry if you are disappointed, dear girl," he said, drawing her gently down on the divan and gripping her hand firmly in his, "but it gives me the courage to tell you what I wanted to say for a long time. Will you drop still life and the figure, oils and studio life—and dig hard into architecture and interior decoration? That's your gift. I've known it ever since the first night I stepped into this room and studied your hangings. And she who helps to build a home is as great as she who paints pictures for its walls. Will you?"

"Do you think I could really?"

His words had been balm to her aching ears. She raised those wonderful gray eyes to his brown ones, and her lips curved into a smile pathetically brave and womanly. And again Remington did the thing he had not anticipated. He bent over deliberately and kissed the lovely lips.

"I want to be your teacher," he said gently. "Not for a few weeks or months, but always. Why, you know we've done those cottage drawings together and won! Here's the letter. We'll build one of these very houses on the site I was showing you last week. In the attic we'll have our studio. Think of the houses we can plan there, with the whole of New York harbor to inspire us! And some day when Daniels wants us to design a house for him we'll laugh and turn him down."

"Donald Remington," she said, sternly suppressing the dancing light in her eyes, "do you call this a proposal of partnership or matrimony?"

"Look me in the eye and ask that question again," he said.

Her glance fell before his.

"I am thirty-four tomorrow," she murmured faintly.

"You are the loveliest woman in the world and the only one for me. I knew that the first time I saw you. Besides, I am of age myself. Will you marry me tomorrow?"

"I will not!" gasped the astonished Wilhelmina.

"Why not?" argued Remington.

"Because I give a dinner tomorrow night to a crowd—and there is no time to call it off. It was to celebrate the coming of Daniels."

Just for an instant the shadow of regret fell upon her lovely face, and Remington, seeing it, took her in his arms.

"Bless the old bear! If he'd pronounced you a genius where would I have been?"

His Position.

"What is your name?" asked the justice.

"Leggitt Fergrubb, your honor," answered the prisoner, a red nosed specimen of the genus hobo.

"You are charged with vagrancy, having no visible means of support and being a common nuisance in the neighborhood. What have you got to say for yourself?"

"I hain't got no visible means of support, your honor, but that ain't my fault. I'm out of work."

"Have you tried to get work?"

"I couldn't begin to tell you, your honor, how hard I've tried."

"I suppose not. How long is it since you have had any occupation?"

"'Bout a year, or it may be two years."

"What was your last job?"

"I had a position in a barber shop."

"A position? What kind?"

"Juxtaposition, your honor. I was next."

"Six months in the workhouse!" roared the police justice. "Call the next case!"—Chicago Tribune.

Humor and Philosophy

PERT PARAGRAPHS.

THE good who die young might have been like the rest of us if given a chance.

Will emancipated woman also insist on the privilege of being bald?

It is hard to find the silver lining in a cloud the title to your lot.

How we do hate to see a rich uncle dallying with the ante!

Buying a flying machine these days is easier than sprouting wings.

Men are lying awake nights concocting fall styles that will put us to sleep.

A joy rider makes appropriate living for a cell.

A gardener raises onions, but a baker raises bread.

A light in the window at 2.30 a. m. doesn't cause the masculine heart to jump for joy.

Why should you expect any one else to do better than you do yourself while you hold the opinion that you are better than any one else is one of the unexplained things.

Stumbling Blocks.

Something's always turning up!
Plans are laid with care
That we think are bound to work
And will get somewhere.
But the something in the way
That we did not see
Twists them into forty shapes,
Makes them climb a tree.

We concoct a little scheme
That looks swell indeed.
Not a reason we can see
Why it won't succeed.
But it strikes a snag we did
Not suspect was there,
And at once our splendid scheme
Sails into the air.

When we meet a pretty girl
Who is just our size
And we have her on the slate
For our special prize
Some one handsomer appears
Who has got the price,
And she turns a shoulder cold
As a cake of ice.

Thus it is we never know
What a day will bring.
Though we with the greatest care
Something's always turning up.
Useless 'tis to frown.
That is why our dearest plans
Get a turning down.

Nothing to Speak Of.

"He has stolen my heart," said the coquette.

"I wouldn't believe it of him," said the cynic.

"Why not?"

"He wouldn't be guilty of petty larceny."

Deplorable.

The summer, hot,
Is on the wane,
And I am not
Upon the gain.
My pocketbook
Is empty quite,
And not a look-
In is in sight
To rehabilitate my cash
And render nil
My dismal crash.
Vacation is,
Of course, all right,
But, oh, gee whiz,
The bill's a fright!

Getting to Them.

"I do hope airships will soon be within the reach of all."

"Would you like one?"

"You bet."

"What for?"

"To reach my castles in the air."

Did Her No Good.

"That fellow that took you home has kissed the blarney stone all right."

"Is it feminine?"

"No."

"Then maybe he did."

Deserved Killing.

"What language is that you are studying?"

"One of the dialects of the Russian."

"Then it isn't a dead language."

"No, but it ought to be."

Knew the Cost.

"Where would you advise me to spend my honeymoon?"

"In your bank."

"My bank?"

"Yes, or near it."

But More Respectable.

"My son, I hear you are gambling."

"No, father, just speculating."

"Well, what's the difference?"

"You lose more speculating."

CORN AND CHOLERA.

Hog raisers the country over are putting two and two together in the matter of excessively high prices of corn and absence of hog cholera and drawing some deductions that ought to be of value for a good many years to come along the line of the connection between the health of the hog and the food ration which it is given. It has been observed during the past eighteen months—an interval which has seen scant feeding of corn owing to high price—that there has been an almost total absence of the swine plague in sections where corn has constituted the chief feeding and fattening ration. The net result of this situation has meant an enormous saving to hog raisers, and this whether the connection between feed and animal health is as close as held by some or not. There is surely enough in the theory to make careful study and comparisons of feeding conditions in different seasons worth while. It has been a matter of observation with a good many that the worst outbreaks of cholera have usually followed on the heels of an inordinate stuffing of young pigs with green and immature corn, the plague finding fertile soil for development for months after in droves of hogs whose health had been weakened as a result of this irrational method of feeding. If it turns out, therefore, that the feeder can just as well sell a part of his corn and at the same time save his hogs, it would seem clearly in his interest to do so.

ABOUT CEMENT TILE.

It is only justice and fairness to those contemplating the drainage of wet land to speak another word of warning touching the use of cement tiles in the manufacture of which the proper kind of clean, sharp sand has not been used or which do not contain a sufficient per cent of cement to give them strength and durability. Within a fortnight we have heard one who is interested in a square deal for the user of tiles say that a short time since he saw cement tiles of this shoddy description taken from the ditch all gone to pieces which were laid but eighteen months ago. The worst feature about the matter is that one who is not acquainted with cement tiles cannot tell at a glance whether they are properly made or not, while the putting of them in the ground to find out is altogether too expensive an experiment for the average man to monkey with. In view of this situation it follows that the only safeguard that one can have in purchasing cement tiles is the character and experience of the man who has made and offers them for sale. Makers of clay tiles concede that cement tiles, properly made, are as good as clay tiles, and this is quite a concession for a competitor to make, but no such authority as this need be cited to prove that poor cement tiles are not worth a continental—in fact, are, if laid, a good deal worse than nothing.

A WINNING COMBINATION.

The first five or six years in the life of an orchard may be counted upon as well nigh unproductive. To overcome this some grow a cover crop in sections where the winters are cold, which, being a secondary consideration, can be counted on for but a slight return. In the west, where the winters are milder, strawberries are grown among the trees and not only serve this purpose where needed, but give generous return for the use of the land. In the Hood river valley, famed as an apple and strawberry section, the strawberries in the young orchard net the owners all the way from $200 to $700 per acre. At the end of five years the trees come into bearing when the numbers of rows may be decreased or the plants entirely removed. Strawberries might well be grown thus in even much colder sections, as the plants and covering required to protect them would catch as much snow as would be needed to protect the roots of the trees.

THE ORANGE SCALE.

The California orange grower has lately had to cope with one of the most serious pests which have troubled him—the orange scale, which has appeared in several colors and is analogous to the San Jose scale. Usual methods of spraying with bordeaux or lime-sulphur solutions seem to be ineffective. The method at present followed is to cover the trees with a tight canvas and give a thorough fumigation with hydrocyanic acid gas, one of the most deadly volatile poisons known, which is sure death to all forms of animal or bacterial life with which it comes in contact. The process is a tedious and expensive one, as it takes some time to treat each tree, but it is the only way out for those who hope to produce an orange crop which will pass muster at the packing house.

Losses from lightning over the country were $6,000,000 last year, and 60 per cent of the fire losses in country districts for this period were directly traceable to lightning.

Where small fruit trees are damaged by hail they may be helped out by cutting off the badly injured limbs and even a portion of the trunk. This will induce a growth of new limbs to take the place of the old. If the trunk is badly injured it would probably be best to remove it entirely and reset with a new one.

Texas leads all other states in the variety of cactuses which grow within her borders, California being a close second. These vary in size from those that are of a delicate and fragile type to those that grow eight or ten feet high and have much the appearance of trees. In blossom the variation in color, size and form is almost as great.

To prove beyond question the increasing prosperity of Kansas one need only cite the fact that, while in 1891 the Sunflower State grew but 34,384 acres of alfalfa, this area was increased in 1907 to 743,050 acres, and for the present year the last named figures are doubtless far outgrown, like the small boy's year before last suit.

A sketch of the history of the alfalfa plant appearing in a late agricultural paper holds that it originated southwest of the central part of Asia, which is the district generally credited with being the location of the garden of Eden. If this theory can be worked out it seems that we should have a feeling of gratitude for Adam for being the disseminator of this great legume, in spite of the fact that we usually credit him with being responsible for weed pests that succeeding generations have been cursed with.

Not in many a year has there been a more magnificent crop of wheat harvested than has been secured during the past few weeks in the great wheat belt lying just west of the Mississippi river. Let the great forests of corn but bring forth to maturity without killing frost the myriad ears that are already in sight and there will be granaries and cribs everywhere that will be literally full to overflowing. This means that confidence, prosperity and good times are going to prevail in a degree seldom witnessed in the history of the country.

Breeders of Guernsey cattle in the state of Michigan are much interested in a move which has lately been made whereby Grosse isle, near Detroit, is to be turned into a Guernsey island where no cattle will be kept but thoroughbreds of this popular dairy breed. Last year sixteen thoroughbred cows were imported from the island of Guernsey, in the English channel. One of the hobbies of the men who are interested in the enterprise is clean milk, and this product will be shipped to Detroit for local consumption. The move is bound to give the breeding of Guernsey cattle a boost as well as the general dairy interests of the state.

In favoring a narrower highway some have argued that the sale of this redeemed land would aggregate $30,000 per township on the basis of a valuation of $125 per acre and could be well used as a fund for improving the roads in the territory. This plan is all right in theory, but the fact of the matter is that in the case of a vacation of a part or all of the highway the land so vacated reverts to the owner of the adjoining property, whose it was before the road was established. But notwithstanding this a narrowing of the road a couple of rods would in a majority of cases be the means of reducing just that amount the unsightly weeds and grass at either side, which often, owing to the way the road is graded, it is almost impossible to cut with a machine.

For the past two or three years a considerable increase in the consumption of oranges has been effected through advertising certain weeks as "orange" week, during which fruit of especial quality would be put on the market and very reasonable prices would prevail. Much has been done to popularize this fine fruit through just such well managed publicity campaigns. Following along lines somewhat similar, the raisin growers of California adopted a scheme last spring, advertising April 29 extensively as "raisin" day, the idea being to cultivate a taste for and increase the consumption of raisins as a table fruit. While not all of the thirty-five tons of raisins produced in the San Joaquin valley in 1908 were disposed of as a result of the campaign, a much greater quantity was consumed than would have been under normal conditions.

An eleven acre orchard located in the Yakima valley, in south central Washington, changed hands recently at $30,000, the buildings on the place having a value of about $9,000. This meant that the orchard proper, which comprised about ten acres set in five-year-old trees was valued at $2,700 an acre. The setting of so high a price on fruit ranches of this kind is due to the fact that from eight years of age and up orchards in this section frequently give a net return of from $500 to $1,200 per acre. It is this productive capacity which makes raw sagebrush land well located with water available worth all the way from $300 to $1,000 per acre. Land in the corn and small grain belt is roughly considered worth per acre six times its annual net productive capacity. On the basis of this ratio it will easily be seen why western fruit ranches are held so valuable.

A heavy frost which hits an immature corn crop impairs its usefulness in just about the same degree that the smoking of cigarettes impairs the vitality of a small boy. In both instances a pretty effective crimp is put on further progress or usefulness.

There was recently captured at San Pedro, Cal., a sea turtle seven feet long weighing about a thousand pounds and thought by those acquainted with this type of sea life to be at least a thousand years old. Those who caught the turtle tried to land it alive, but it became entangled in the buoy ropes and was finally towed in dead.

A Peruvian strain of alfalfa is being developed by the department of agriculture which, it is claimed, grows more rapidly, starts earlier in the spring and grows later in the autumn and will stand more severe winters than the ordinary kinds. Officials of the department predict that it will be introduced into the northern states in the near future.

If buyers do not give the price for a product which the grower feels he should in fairness receive, it may be well for him to harvest his product and hold it for a better price, provided it is not of too perishable a character. This would hold true of apples, potatoes, onions, beans, several root crops and likewise the grain crops. This can, of course, be more effectively done if those interested in a given product cooperate to secure the end sought.

Of the imported summer help which has assisted in securing the great grain crops of the Dakotas, Kansas, Nebraska and Oklahoma none has been found more satisfactory from the employer's standpoint than the many college boys who have taken this means of swelling the fund which is to help carry them through the coming year's schooling. Not only have they been found active and intelligent, but energetic and willing to perform the duty required of them.

The Shasta daisy, one of the finest floral creations which Luther Burbank has to his credit, is seen gracing many a western park and garden and furnishes one of the finest features in the floral display to be found at the Seattle exposition. It is a rank and thrifty grower and has a beautiful blossom with hollow heart and pure white strap shaped petals which often have a spread of three inches. It wins admiration from all who see it, and it will not be long until all up to date florists will have it in stock.

A Minnesota feeder has a good word to say for the Jerusalem artichoke, a distant cousin of the wild artichoke which has proved a pest in many a tilled field. He has found that horses, cattle, hogs, sheep and goats like the tubers and even eat the leaves, while some feeders use the tops as silage. He suggests the artichoke as a ration along with alfalfa or clover pasture, the animals being finished for market with an added ration of ground oats and peas, wheat or barley. Farther south corn would naturally be the finisher.

Many a farmer in sections where the usual rainfall is ample, but likely to be a little short during the latter part of July and August, might well learn a helpful lesson from the irrigation farmer of semiarid sections of the west, who, shortly after flooding his orchard or other cultivated crop, at once proceeds by careful cultivation and harrowing to make a mulch of fine mellow soil on the surface and thus retain the moisture which the soil has been given with much pains on his part. The principle holds as well whether the moisture comes from a ditch or falls from the clouds.

Some experiments which have been conducted by the department of agriculture have made clear the important fact that the work of insects, and especially the borer known as the "sawyer," may be very greatly reduced if the bark of such trees is removed within a month after being blown over or if they are cut into logs without removing the bark and placed in ponds or streams. In the case of timber which is allowed to lie with the bark on it has been found that its value is reduced about one-third within a period of two months. When so much attention is being given to a conservation of our forest resources, a suggestion of this kind ought to be well received by those whom it most directly concerns.

One of the most deplorable sights which the traveler through the west sees is large areas of fertile mountain slopes which have been denuded of their magnificent growth of conifers by the deadly fumes of copper smelteries or the terrible forest fires set by sparks from passing trains, by the campfire of careless hunter or axman or by revengeful Indians who have sought by this means to debar the white hunter from a territory over which its primal owner could no longer hold sway. So intense have been some of these fires that not only the giants of the forest have been killed and in many cases half burned by the conflagration, but all seeds and seedlings destroyed, which will prevent reforestation except by artificial planting. In most cases the land referred to is too rough and steep for tillage, so it is doomed to idleness until such time as systematic planting is undertaken.

HUNTING IN THE FROZEN FAR NORTH

Arctic Sport as Described by Nimrod John R. Bradley.

I started some years ago to shoot in all parts of the world in order to collect specimens of game, so I thought it best to begin at home, in America. I shot in Mexico, New Mexico, Arizona, the Rocky mountains and up in Alaska, then went to Africa and the Altai mountains of northern Mongolia and Siberia. Then came the trip to the Arctic with Dr. Frederick A. Cook, the explorer.

If you are going up there right you must have a vessel of your own and take chances of losing it going through the ice. The insurance companies will not insure your vessel at any old price In my case they said I was going too far north. You must take chances of losing your life as well as your vessel, for you are navigating through waters that are not charted, over rocks not discovered and with fogs five days out of seven in the week. Then when you get the game you must get out on the ice or in a small boat.

The Eskimos make breeches out of bearskin, and in the winter time they must kill these bears for their clothing. The dogs run your bears up and then you shoot them. That is one way of doing it. Another way is to go out in a small boat and get out on the ice and chase them up. They are not as dangerous as people think they are. The polar bear, for instance, does not seem to charge as the grizzly bear does. The polar bear has to swim out to you, seated in your boat, and I killed one of them once when I was in my pajamas. I was lying one morning in the schooner in which we were cruising, reading a book, when the man at the helm hollered out "Polar bear!" I came out on deck and saw one on the ice. I got my gun without thinking of putting on my clothes. There were two men out in a dory, all excited.

I said, "Don't get excited; row up to the bear."

The bear weighed eight or nine hundred pounds, and he was on a cake of ice about three or four acres square and four or five hundred yards from the vessel. As we rowed up to the bear he jumped off the ice and came toward us. Now and then he would rise partly out of the water to see what we were doing. At about seventy-five yards I hit him low in the shoulder, and he then swam to a little piece of ice. I hit him again, and he swam back to the big piece of ice. I told the men to get up closer, but they were afraid the bear would upset the boat. I said, "Row up alongside of him," and finally we got on the ice, where I killed him. Then I put a rope around him and towed him to the ship, and we yanked him up on the vessel. The dogs on the vessel were sitting there waiting until we could cut him up to get some to eat.

The most exciting sport is harpooning walrus, and this is the best sport in the Arctic. They weigh between sixteen and seventeen hundred pounds, with good big ivory tusks. The natives kill them for meat for themselves and their dogs. Two go in a kayak and get close up to a bunch of walrus, generally on the ice sunning themselves. They get up to the walrus and manuever around, setting up a piece of skin on the boat so that the animals can't see them. When they get in striking distance, at least twenty-five feet, they harpoon them. Harpoons are made of wood for the handle—driftwood, probably some hundreds of years old, which has been handed down from one generation to the other. The lances are made of ivory or caribou horn. The line they use to tie the harpoon to the float is of walrus hide. After they get the harpoon in the walrus they let go the float. They have a big sealskin blown up with air, a big air bag, and they let that go, and on that is a sort of sail, a four cornered thing made of sealskin, so that it will hold the walrus back from swimming too fast. After getting the harpoon into the walrus they back away. The animal has to get up every five minutes to breathe, and it tries to get up on the ice, and the men then throw a big ivory lance and they keep on doing that until the animal bleeds to death.

I watched them one day for about two hours getting one big walrus. I was in my motorboat at the time, and I said, "I can beat that way; I can kill walrus quicker than the natives can harpoon them." The first officer was at the wheel and Dr. Cook at the stern, and I had the whole boat, which was about thirty feet long, to myself. I had a harpoon, but was going to try to kill them with a rifle. You must hit them in the head—otherwise they will go into the water—and you must kill them with a steel bullet. So we maneuvered through the ice until we saw about thirty walrus on a pan of ice about 200 feet square. I said to my first officer, "Go up on the ice." We had heard how dangerous the walrus were—that they could easily kick a plank out of the boat. The first officer was rather afraid and said, "If a walrus gets in the boat I will hit him with an ax."

I said, "They can't catch this boat. Go right around and around and I will do the rest of it." There were about thirty walrus. I killed three of them and the others charged the boat, but as we went around they could not catch us. We secured the wounded walrus, cut them up and put them in the dory. We cached the meat for Dr. Cook's expedition.

The natives stack it up the same as wood and freeze it. I chased up a herd of females once—the males are generally together and the females are together with their young—I chased this bunch of eight or nine females. I didn't know they were females until after I had killed some of them. We got up pretty close and circled around, and as we did so I wounded some of them, among others one youngster. Then the whole bunch stood round the youngster, which weighed about 200 pounds, The mother was around this youngster, holding it up, and that gave me the chance to kill the old ones, Those in the dory began putting the harpoons in the old ones so they would not sink. I had just wounded this youngster, which could not swim. Dr. Cook and I pulled him in the launch, and it almost upset the boat—he was about five or six months old—and all at once he began to flap and set up his fins. I was sitting on him and he threw me off. I had to hit him over the head with an ax and kill him or he would have upset the boat. The natives all laughed. They thought it was such great fun getting this live walrus in a boat. We were about eight or ten miles from the vessel, so we tied those we had killed and pulled them up on the shore, eight in all. I went out the next day, killed five in the same place. I finally killed all there were in the herd. This was about eight miles from Etah, about 78.18 north lattitude.

Then I used to go out and get arctic hares, which are really big rabbits. The natives make boots out of the sealskin and used the hares for their socks. Their underclothes consist of a shirt, for which they used auk. That is what they wear during the winter time, and Dr. Cook and all his men wore the same. Sometimes there would be a school of walrus of one or two hundred, all together, very close to the vessel. They would come up to breathe, and I use to have a lot of fun harpooning them. We would tie them to the boat after harpooning them, and they'd give us a good ride, but they were quite liable to pull our boat over.

The natives kill all game with harpoons, for they have no other way, though in late years some of them have had Winchester rifles that Peary gave them. They are very curious and try to take the rifle apart to see how it is made, and then the rifles get out of commission. I left Dr. Cook fifteen rifles and plenty of ammunition, which he lent to the natives, with four or five cartridges each, and when they went out shooting they must bring in game for it, and then the rifles were taken away from them until they went out again.

There are plenty of musk oxen up in Ellsmere Land, which Dr. Cook encountered on the dash to the pole. When the natives kill these animals they freeze them and use every bit of them and pile them up for the dogs and the native. They make caches at different points in crossing the island.

Hunting musk oxen in Ellsmere Land is not at all like hunting them in the far north of Canada. Away up there in Ellsmere they are not nearly so active and are more stupid. There is less sport in shooting them, of course, but Dr. Cook was concerned only in getting food.

The casual reader may have formed the conclusion that we did a lot of unnecessary promiscuous killing. On the contrary, we shot nothing which we did not need. There is nothing to be had for food and for making clothing in the far north but wild animals and fish. The most successful men in that part of the world are the best hunters. These primitive people, with all their low mentality, have much better ideas of game protection than the average American. And it is well, indeed, for their whole existance depends upon the fauna of that unhospitable region. Needless to say, they are all good hunters.—John R. Bradley in Recreation Magazine.

THE LURE OF THE MASK

By HAROLD MacGRATH

A Fascinating Romance by One of the Most Popular Novelists of the Day

The Lure of the Mask

A story of the most alluring character in fiction. Such a woman in real life often decides the destiny of a nation. To read of her is as interesting and exciting as it would be to meet her. You will find the story fascinating from beginning to end.

By Harold MacGrath

THROUGH the popularity and merit of his earlier literary hits, "Arms and the Woman," "The Puppet Crown," "The Grey Cloak," "Half a Rogue" and "The Man on the Box," Mr. MacGrath has won high rank as a fictionist.

"The Lure of the Mask" is rated his best

Executor's Sale

OF VALUABLE

Real Estate

Under and by virtue of a power conferred upon the undersigned as Executor of the last will and testament of Martha Warren, deceased, now of record in the Orphans' Court of Garrett county, he will on

SATURDAY,
the 18th Day of September,

1909, at the hour of 11 o'clock A. M., in front of the First National Bank, in the town of Oakland, Maryland, offer for sale at public auction, all the following described real estate situated adjoining the town of Oakland on the South side, and in what is generally known as "Catonsville:"

1. All that part of Military Lot No. 863, lying South of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and contained within the fence lines maintained by the said Martha Warren, said fence lines being located near the original Military Lot lines of Lot No. 863, or that portion of it South of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad as aforesaid; except about one-half acre which was devised by the said Martha Warren to Levi Zwyers. The part hereby offered for sale contains about five acres and is improved by three dwelling houses, a couple of stables and other outbuildings, and presents a most excellent opportunity to secure a home and location for any one desiring to engage in the trucking or poultry business, as Oakland is known and recognized as a splendid market for all products of this kind.

2. All that part of Military Lot No. 863, lying on the Northeast side of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, and between said Railroad and what is known as the "Dead Pond;" this part contains six acres, is unimproved, but presents a splendid opportunity for an investment, as the same is within the town limits, and has about 800 feet frontage on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, convenient to switches and suitable for docks, warehouses or manufacturing establishments, and is the only railroad frontage now available for said purposes within said town.

Terms of sale, Cash.

FRED. A. THAYER, Executor.

I will also, at the same time and place, as agent for Levi Zweyer, offer at public auction the half acre above reserved. The same is improved by a dwelling house, and a number of trees of choice fruit.

Plat of the whole may be seen at my office.

F. A. THAYER.

New Method Gas Ranges

Will Reduce Your Gas Bills 25 Per Cent

Will NOT RUST or BURN OUT.
Will BAKE THE SAME on All Parts of the Oven Bottom.
Will BROIL or TOAST Evenly Without Burning
WILL NOT HAVE ANY EXPLOSIONS.
If you will read the following you will learn why.

Are You Looking for a Gas Range and Want to Buy "The Best?"

WHICH IS?

YOU see gas ranges and gas ranges, all claimed to be "The Best," making you in doubt which is? If you could examine all the gas ranges that are made, you would find that there is very little difference in their construction as far as the burners, manner of lighting them and construction of the Oven are concerned. (These are the things in a range that decide how much gas you will burn and how well your cooking and baking will be done.) and if you could see a range made ten years ago you would find that its construction was practically the same as those shown you today with one exception.

THE NEW METHOD

When considering buying a Gas Range the first point you will think of, is the cost of the gas it will consume, for which reason, if you were shown two ranges, although in appearance the first pleased you more than the second, you would not hesitate to purchase the latter, if you were satisfied that with it you could do your cooking and consume one-fourth less gas than with the former.

If you buy a New Method Range or Hot Plate, your gas bill will be from 20 per cent. to 30 per cent. less each month than it would be if you were using any Gas Range or Hot Plate having cast iron burners.

The reason why the NEW METHOD patented steel burners have from 20 per cent. to 30 per cent. higher efficiency than any cast iron burner, is that they are made of Polished Key Steel which, together with their funnel-shaped jet holes does away with all the friction that there is in the rough cast burners with their thick jet holes. This allows a much larger quantity of air to be drawn in through the mixers and properly mixed with the gas without the popping back, at the same time producing a much more intense heat without any odor. The more oxygen burned the less gas.

These burners are light in weight, consequently can be easily lifted out washed and cleaned.

THE SECOND POINT

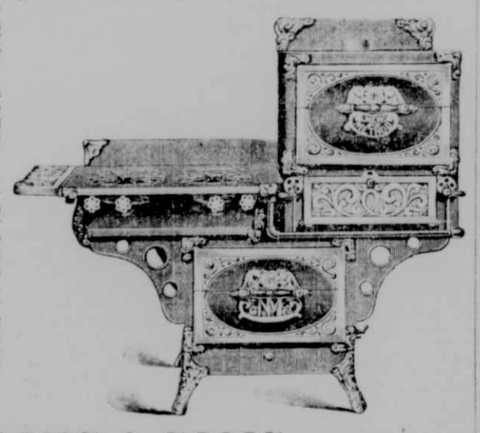
That you will consider, is how the range will bake. The construction of a New Method Oven is entirely different from the construction in any other Gas Range.

The reason why the New Method construction makes an oven that will bake on the top, bottom and on all sides the same, with a comparatively small consumption of gas, is on account of the Steel Oven Burners being placed at each side (and which can be lighted direct without any possibility of an explosion) below the flame plates that carry the flames toward an opening in the centre where the heat passes upward against the oven bottom, thence through each side flue to within three inches of the top, thence downward leaving the oven three inches from the bottom so that whatever is being baked is subjected to uniform heat on all sides. This is not the case in any other gas range, all of which have iron pipe burners located in the centre and against the oven bottom which, being in direct contact with the flame, is heated much hotter than any other part of the oven and will soon burn out steel and warps and cracks cast iron oven bottoms.

Also the oven burners placed in this way being always in direct contact with the flame from the other will, in a few years, cause them to warp and have to be renewed. We are able to line the oven top, back and sides with thick asbestos, which retains the heat without any fear of the oven rusting from the inside, on account of the oven plates being all enameled on the inside.

THE THIRD POINT

How will it toast and broil? On account of the location of the burners, the top above the broiler pan will be covered with a solid sheet of even flame that will broil or toast the entire surface the same, which cannot be done with pipe burners located in the center.



THE FOURTH POINT

The durability of the range. Many people are afraid to buy a steel gas range, knowing that the average life of other Gas Ranges made of this material is from five to eight years on account of the body rusting through. This objection we have entirely overcome by enameling the steel plates both inside and out under a high degree of heat, making the New Method Ranges as durable as if they were made from cast iron and without any of the disadvantages of the latter.

THE FIFTH POINT

Ease in taking care of and keeping clean.

The front, supply pipes and mixers are underneath the top, where they do not catch the grease and dirt. All the castingare smooth so that with the enamel finish of the steel the entire range can be wiped off with soap and water without any corners or carving to dig out.

The man Who Makes A STUDY OF HIS APPEARANCE

is the man who best appreciates the detail of the tailoring we turn out. The workmanship passes without a question, the fit is naturally a matter of course, but the shape we mould into the garments give them a character that finishes them off and makes the satisfaction of the owner complete.

All this is a bid for your next tailoring order. We know we can make you the best clothes you ever wore. We want you to know it. That order is the best and only sure way to settle the question.

AMENDMENT TRICK NAILED BY LAWYER

Thousands of Voters Will Be Deprived of Rights of Franchise.

The foreign-born voter, and the sons of foreign-born men, are agitated over the proposed disfranchising amendment framed by the Democrats, which will come up for the approval of the people in November. The question as to whether a man whose father, a soldier in a New York regiment, killed in front of Fredericksburg, is entitled to vote is answered to day affirmatively in a morning paper which is backing the amendment.

The perplexed voter sent a letter to the newspaper mentioned. It follows:

"In regard to the amendment to be voted on this fall I am in a peculiar position, and I am informed that if it is adopted I cannot register, although I have been a voter for more than 20 years. My father was born in Germany, of Jewish parents, and he came to this country before the Civil War, and when that war broke out he enlisted in a New York regiment and died from wounds received at Fredericksburg, Va. I was then only a year and a half old. I cannot prove that he was ever naturalized. My mother is long since dead. I don't know anyone who knows that my father was ever naturalized. Therefore, if the amendment is passed I cannot vote. You say that no white man will be disfranchised. I understand that down in Annapolis they have the same kind of a law, and I am informed that a number of white men are in the same box as I am, who cannot prove their fathers were naturalized, and they could not register. Now if that is so, why do you say no white man will be disfranchised?

"Ever since I have been in Maryland I have voted the Democratic ticket, but I will not vote that ticket this fall, because I will be voting for a party that will take my vote away from me. I have two brothers, older than myself, and if they lived in Maryland they would be in the same box.

"JOSEPH S. BERGER."

The answer to the letter states that Mr. Berger is entitled to be registered and must be accepted by the register if he makes the statement under oath that his father was naturalized.

Leading Republicans take exception to the opinion given by the newspaper on the authority of an attorney and point out that it is misleading and intended to hoodwink the unwary.

In discussing the letter and answer today a prominent lawyer stated that under the provision of the law, if it should pass, Mr. Berger, or any other man, in similar circumstances, would be disqualified as a voter, notwithstanding the fact that he had exercised his right of franchise for years.

"As I understand the case," continued the lawyer, "Mr. Berger would lose his vote because he could not state under oath that his father had been a citizen. According to his statement he was 18 months old when his father was killed. His mother has since died and he has no means of stating, as a matter of fact, that his father had voted, or had been naturalized. He or any other man could declare that his or their father had been a citizen, but if he or they had conscientious scruples and would not swear to a statement to that effect they would be debarred from voting.

"The point is a fine one and it will be used by the Democratic spellbinders on the stump this fall, but it is a vicious and specious piece of business and should have no weight with those persons who are situated similarly.

"The measure itself specifies absolutely that a voter's parent must have been a citizen or had taken out his first papers prior to January 1, 1869, and the applicant for registration must have positive proof that his parent had complied with all the requirements. In the absence of such proof, or if the would-be voter would not swear to what he knew to be not so, he would be disqualified forever.

"There are any number of person who are affected by this condition who today do not realize that their rights to vote are in danger should the measure become a law.

"Who among us at this time could swear positively that his father voted prior to 1869? I venture to say that 99 persons out of 100 could not testify truthfully that their fathers voted previous to the time prescribed in the proposed law.

"The opinion expressed through the morning newspaper is misleading and tends to work harm among people who will be made to suffer through the sins of omission or commission of their parents."—Baltimore Star.

Sewer Work Being Rushed.

Mr. Willian Tunny, the sewer and water contractor who has been engaged during the major part of the summer installing the water and sewer systems of Oakland, has been somewhat handicapped the past few weeks on account of a large number of his men quitting the job in sympathy with an Italian boss who was discharged. Tuesday morning and again yesterday morning gangs of men arrived here from New York and they were at once put to work in making the excavations for the sewer system, two miles of which yet remain to be laid, in addition to several connections to be made where the sewers pass under and above the water courses through the town. The reservoir is now completed and a good supply of water is being kept in it by the water works engineer, Mr. Arthur Lawton.

MR. SLOAN'S CANDIDACY AND HIS FITNESS

A Man of Exceptional Worth, Integrity and Standing.

To the Editor of The Republican:

The reputation a man establishes among his friends and neighbors and business or professional associates, who have known him all his life and have had full opportunity to observe his every action, public and private, cannot be said to be without value in estimating the man's fitness for high public office.

The writer is now and has been, since he reached manhood's estate, some years ago, a member of the bar of Allegany county. As such he has some knowledge of the relative standing and legal ability of the attorneys at our bar, and of how they are regarded by our people, both as to skill in the law and as to personal character. As one of these men has been nominated by the Republican party for the Chief Judgeship of the Fourth Judicial Circuit, it may not be wrong for the writer to venture to give, in a few brief words, his idea of the opinion entertained by the bar and people of Allegany county of Mr. D. Lindley Sloan, the Republican nominee for the bench.

Mr. Sloan is perhaps better known personally to the people of his home county, where he was born and raised, than he is in the other counties of the circuit, although it is believed by many persons competent to judge that he has a larger number of friends and acquaintances in the other counties of the circuit, particularly in Garrett county, than any other practicing member of our bar. This fact is due partly to the wide extent of his practice, which frequently requires his presence in the other counties of the circuit, and partly to his genial and friendly personality, which makes a favorable impression and wins the regard of the many people with whom for many years past, and a matter of daily routine, he has come in personal contact. There is no atmosphere of mystery or wall of exclusiveness about Mr. Sloan, and he has no false or exaggerated ideas of his own dignity.

Although for many years past his time, like that of every able lawyer of prominence, has had a recognized and substantial market value, no worthy person, however poor or humble, has ever failed to gain access to his presence and a kind, courteous hearing. This quality of unvarying affability has been a noticeable characteristic of Mr. Sloan throughout his entire career and the people who know him feel that it would not be affected or changed by his elevation to the bench. A judge should unite in himself all the requirements of legal learning, practical experience at the bar and impartial judicial temperment. But, in addition to this, he should be known among the people and should not consider himself above the people who make him. The many people in this circuit who for many years have been familiar with the personal character and legal attainments of Mr. Sloan feel confident that if elected he will make one of the ablest, fairest and most popular judges who has ever sat upon the bench.

When it comes to a consideration of those things which go to make up a judge, comparisons, are largely a matter of personal opinion, based on observation. No person of sound judgment will believe for a minute that either of the great political parties would or could afford to nominate for the bench a man not duly qualified for that important office. With a wealth of timber from which to make judicial nominations, it has always been and is now the policy of both the Republican and Democratic parties to put forward as their candidates for the bench men who represent the highest traditions of the bar and who, along with lofty personal character, combine all the requisites of ripe legal learning and experience. Any other policy would be suicidal. It therefore seems a thankless task to compare the qualifications of the present Republican and Democratic nominees for the bench. To say that one is the superior of the other would be to expose one's self to the accusation of undue favoritism and partisanship.

The Democratic party, by the circulation of anonymous campaign literature in behalf of its candidate, has not hesitated to lay itself open to this charge to his great detriment in the minds of all thoughtful and impartial people. It would have been better for the Democracy not to have tried to influence the minds of the people by the circulation of false reports, for the level of intelligence in the three counties of the circuit is so high that such methods can only react to the injury of the proposed beneficiary.

In Mr. Sloan the Republican party has nominated for the bench a lawyer of the most extensive experience and approved ability and against whose personal character no word can be uttered. By education, experience and character he is fitted in every way to make an ideal judge. This is all that any Republican can ask, and it is all that any Republican does ask. If we, the Republicans of Garrett, Allegany and Washington counties, cannot elect to the bench of the Court of Appeals, which has been almost exclusively Democratic for half a century, a man who possesses the splendid and unsurpassed judicial qualifications of Mr. D. Lindley Sloan, then we might as well make up our minds to lay down to the Democracy all along the line, let them pass the Straus amendment, and go out of business in the State of Maryland. For the only hope of the Republican party in this State to gain fair and adequate representation on the bench of the Court of Appeals lies in the Fourth Judicial Circuit.

An Appeal to Farmers to Help with the Census.

To the Editor of The Republican:

Next April a new census is to be taken. It is our duty to give correct data for it. Director Durand asks the farmers to keep written records of everything raised on the farm during the year 1909. It would be well to keep a book and jot down everything raised. Since we must give this information we should have it correct.

The following is what you will be required to give: Value of farm, acres in farm, amount cleared and amount in woodland; also acreage, value and amount of each crop, including the different grain raised, hay, vegetables, fruits, cotton, tobacco, etc. Also the number and value of all animals, poultry and swarms of bees on farm to April 15, 1909; number and value of all young animals, such as pigs, lambs and colts, and of young fowls, such as ducks, geese, turkeys and chickens. He will be required to give number of animals and fowls sold, amount received therefor, number bought and amount paid therefor, also number slaughtered for food, number of cows kept for dairy purposes, amount of milk, cheese and butter produced and sold, amount of honey, eggs and wax produced, amount paid for farm labor, for feed and for fertilizers in 1910. If the farm changes owners the record should be left with the new owner.

The law requires that all information given shall be kept secret.

Let all the farmers lend a helping hand. A CITIZEN.

LETTER TELLS OF DEAL FOR SLAVES

Ancient Epistle Found Under Floor of a House on Bedford Street.

While working at the house, 182 Bedford street, this city, Edgar Walsh, a plumber helper, engaged with Frank C. Simpson, yesterday, found under the floor an old letter addressed to George A. Pennel, Cumberland, Md. It was mailed at Little Crossing, Md., August 22, the postmark being in writing and beside the postmark was written the figure 5, indicating the amount of postage the recipient of the letter paid. The letter is dated August 24, 1845, and is as follows:

Dear Sir:—According to your request I have sent you a black woman. You can have her at 45 dolls. per year and you clothe her. I hope she may suit you. Let me hear from you shortly.

Respectfully,
T. FAIRALL.

The letter was written on a long strip of paper which was folded and sealed with red wax. No envelop was used. It is yellow with age. Mr. Simpson says his uncle, Charles Howell, lived at the house in which the letter was found, in 1854. T. Fairall, the writer of the letter, was Truman Fairall.—Cumberland News.

Lost Finger in Press.

Mr. Leonard Lochner, foreman in this office, met with quite a serious as well as painful accident last Thursday afternoon when he attempted to replace a disarranged part of the newspaper press which he was operating. That particular portion of the press is controlled by a heavy coil spring working on a cam and when the spring came into play the small finger of his left hand was caught between two iron bars working in opposite directions, severing the finger completely at the first joint. Surgical attention was rendered by Dr. Legge and as a result of the accident Mr. Lochner will undergo an enforced idleness of some two or three weeks, which he will spend at his home in Lonaconing.

AGRICULTURAL FAIR TO BE HELD AT SWANTON

Preparations Being Made For Gathering There October 30.

The farmers of Garrett county are again making arrangements for a fair to be held at Swanton on October thirtieth, under the direction of the Swanton Grange.

In order that the work might be divided the following large committee was selected to look after the arrangements: Herman Steiding, John C. Beckman, John A. Beckman, Stewart Paugh, Josiah G. Friend, J. F. Friend, Jr., James Smearman, Edward Shank, Hugh Hamill and Charles T. Sweet, with Mrs. P. F. Mellinger, Mrs. J. F. Friend, Jr., Mrs. Lucy McRobie, Miss Mollie Friend, Miss Carrie Shank and Miss Annie Steiding as a committee on refreshments and entertainment.

On last Thursday night the committee got busy and decided on some of the following points:

Speaking. Senator Brown, President of the State Horticultural Society, having promised his aid a year ago, would be counted on to make an address, and Professor Patterson, Worthy Master of Maryland State Grange and Director of Maryland Agricultural Experiment Station, or Captain Silvester, President of Marviand Agricultural College, would be secured for the occasion if possible.

Music. A movement was made toward securing a brass band and weekly meets will be held under the direction of Prof. Groves, of near Altamont, to practice on the beautiful Grange melodies.

Refreshments. It was decided to not have a picnic, but the above six ladies, with James Smearman as an assistant, were constituted a committee to secure and serve refreshments and it is hoped, thus make the fair self supporting.

Exhibits. No entrance fee will be charged exhibitors, no cesh prizes will be given. It is open to all who wish to see improvement in agriculture and an advance of land values in Garrett county. It is hoped that there will be an increased number of exhibits from the household, garden, field, poultry yard and orchard over last year, and that is saying much, for through the exhibits of our fruit, collected at Swanton and Oakland, at Baltimore, where we were the banner county of the State, and afterwards at Council Bluffs, Iowa, where thirty-three plates of Garrett county apples carried off twenty-eight prizes in competition with the whole country, many investigators have since sought out Garrett county with a view to establishing extensive apple orchards. In short, last year we showed the rest of the State and adjoining states what we could do up here in apples, cauliflower, etc. This year we want to impress them that we are just as great on wheat, oats, potatoes, buckwheat and maple syrup.

While we expect a large exhibit at Swanton in every line, we hope that all our people will catch the Western spirit of enterprise and give Garrett a big boom on the five crops named above. To this end, if the farmers will at once respond in large numbers, bringing their exhibits to Oakland and leaving them in care of one of the banks, (which institutions we hope will be able to make a preliminary display of them), they will be exhibited at the Swanton fair on October thirtieth, each exhibit awarded an appropriate prize and notice thereof given in the county papers. After this the best of them will be exhibited in Baltimore at the exhibit of the State Horticultural Society in the name of the Swanton Grange, each producer, however, having due credit for his particular contribution. If the size of the exhibit warrants it, the Swanton Grange will send two ladies to the State exhibit to serve buckwheat cakes and maple molasses, as only our mountain girls know how.

The time to select apples and pears is when you you are picking them. Six highly colored fruits of uniform size, with stems on, is what you want. Four quarts of grain, (well cleaned) and a peck of potatoes is enough. In maple products, a quart of syrup, (or a gallon to help our girls) and sugar, both granulated and cake.

Everybody send something, and don't forget your names on it, for orders will follow such advertising. California and Washington have found that out. Eastern Maryland and Delaware want our seed potatoes, buckwheat and maple products, and persistent efforts along this line will double land values in Garrett.

Every one help it along with regular Western enthusiasm. Make this a success and next year we can take up cranberries, hops, and wool.

CHARLES T. SWEET.

M. E. CONFERENCE.

Sixty-Third Annual Meeting at Mannington.

The sixty-third annual session of the West Virginia conference of the Methodist Episcopal church will meet in Mannington on September 29. Bishop Luther B. Wilson, D. D., LL. D., will preside. This conference covers the state with the exception of a small section of the eastern panhandle. A large part of southwest Virginia, including the city of Staunton, is also included in the conference.

There are eight great districts, each under the constant supervision of a district superintendent. The members of the church within the conference number 57,200, with 3,697 probationers additional. There are 816 church buildings, valued at $1,879,735; 198 parsonages, valued at $383,388; 1,087 Sunday schools with an enrollment of 64,728. The membership of the annual conference is composed of 173 who are full members; 26 ministers who are candidates for full membership; 69 members who are on the superannuated list through age or infirmity, and 10 members who from some just cause have not been engaged in active work during the past year.

In addition there are 69 supplies, who while not members of the conference, are doing regular work and must report to the conference. There are 35 widows of deceased ministers who are claimants on the funds of the conference. Last year there was paid to these widows and the superannuates the sum of $6,486.

At the conference session every charge sends in a full report of work and the character of every minister comes up for examination, and no name is passed unless it is declared "nothing against him." No men in the world undergo such an annual scrutiny as Methodist ministers. The morning sessions of the conference are devoted to business and the afternoon and evening sessions to the work of the great benevolent societies, such as missions, education, temperance and conference claimants; and to committee work. There are 20 standing committees, which make reports concerning missions, education, freedman's aid, church extension, Sabbath observance, and, indeed, on every subject that commands the care of the church.

An important part of the session is the examination of young men who are candidates for the ministry. The conference has a four years' course of study, and the mastery of which would be equal to a seminary course, and no one is admitted into full membership and ordained as an elder until he has completed this course. After a full examination on the English branches young men are received on probation; at the end of two years if they have passed the examination and "made good" in the work they are received into full membership and ordained as deacons, and after two more years and the completion of the course of study they are ordained as elders.

Perhaps the part of the conference work in which the people are most interested is the appointment of the ministers. There is no longer a time limit in the church. A minister may stay any length of time deemed necessary in a charge. But the theory underlying all appointments is that the minister is appointed only for a single year, and if he returns it must be by reappointment. Often the work of adjustment which assures each minister of appointment and each church of a minister, causes unexpected changes. Men who expect to go back are changed, and men who expected to change are returned; likewise churches expecting changes are disappointed, and those not desiring changes are surprised at a change. It is no easy matter to make 150 appointments, take care of the work, and satisfy 200 and more ministers and 60,000 people.

Another cause of changes among pastors is the completion of the time of a district superintendent, whose term of office is limited to six years; the coming again into the work of men who for some cause have rested a year or more, and finally changes demanded by dissatisfied ministers or charges. All these tend toward changes. This year three district superintendents finish their terms. Asbury Mick, of the Huntington district; J. S. Robinson, of the Morgantown district, and R. B. Ward, of the Oakland district. On account of ill health another district superintendent may resign. There are several prominent churches that expect changes this year, so that the prospect is for a large number of changes. The people will wait anxiously for the list of appointments.

The conference session lasts from Wednesday until the next Monday evening. During some time in the session, generally Friday, laymen, representatives of the different appointmentss hold a laymen's conference. This brings them in touch with the work and is a decided gain to the denomination.

FORMAL NOTIFICATION OF HIS NOMINATION FOR CHIEF JUDGE OF THE FOURTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT

A Pleasing Event At Cumberland, When Mr. D. Lindley Sloan Was Officially Apprised of the Honor Conferred Upon Him by the Republicans of the District.

Mr. D. Lindley Sloan the Republican candidate for chief judge of the Fourth Judicial Circuit, was last Thursday notified of his nomination, the notification taking place in one of the dining rooms of the Windsor Hotel, Cumberland. Previous to the notification address the committe was entertained at dinner by Mr. Sloan, among those present being Hon. A. C. Strite, of Hagerstown, chairman of the committee; Julius Renninger, Esq., of Oakland; and Lloyd L. Shaffer, of Cumberland, representing their several counties on the committee; Congressman George A. Pearre, ex-Senator George L. Wellington, States Attorney David A. Robb, City Councilman George G. Young, F. Brooke Whiting, Esq., Messrs. Richard J. Bruce and Charles W. Donnelly.

At the conclusion of the dinner and while cigars were being lighted, Hon. A. C. Strite, of Hagerstown, chairman of the notification committee, arose and addressed Mr. D. Lindley Sloan, the judicial nominee, and those present as follows:

At a convention of the representatives of the Republican party of Allegany, Garrett and Washington counties, held August 31 in Hagerstown, you were selected as the nominee of that party for the high office of Chief Judge of the Fourth Judicial Circuit of Maryland.

Reposing confidence in your honesty and integrity, knowing your exceptional advantages of education both general and in the special domain of the law, which should eminently fit you for a judicial career, familiar with the sterling qualities of that sturdy Scotch stock from which you spring, believing that your pride of birth and ancestry will stimulate you to the limit of human effort to add new honors to a family name already widely and favorably known and respected, you were deemed a suitable person to whom to tender the honor of such a nomination.

That you have before you many unspent years of your life's calendar is your good fortune. Probably the ablest jurist that has ever sat upon the bench of our Court of Appeals began his judicial career at the age of thirty-three. I refer to Chief Justice John Buchanan. Another Chief Justice, his peer, I might add, and possibly the final judgment of time may pronounce him his superior, began his judicial career at the age of forty-one. I refer to the late Judge Alvey. Young men cannot lay claim to a store of rich experience. Old men only can pride themselves upon it, but young men are in closer touch with their times, the world and their fellowmen, and their energy more than makes up for what they lack in years.

At a time when the rivalry between the two great parties in our own state has reached the point that the one is advocating measures to eliminate altogether the other from the field of politics, measures which run counter to the spirit of the times and the material prosperity and advancement of our state, measures which abridge human liberty rather than extend it, there is need of young, energetic, able and fearless men on the bench, as well as in the arena of active politics.

While you are the nominee of a political party, that party will not ask nor expect any favors from you, if you are elected; you can best honor it by honoring yourself; you can best serve it by making yourself a reputation for industry, deep learning, courtesy in hearing, soberness in considering, wisdom in answering and impartially in deciding—the attributes which always distinguish an able, just and upright judge.

In this spirit we tender you this nomination.

At the close of Mr. Strite's remarks, which were heartily applauded, Mr. D. Lindley Sloan arose and made the following address of acceptance, which address also met with hearty applause:

Messrs. A. C. Strite, Julius C. Renninger, and Lloyd L. Shaffer, Members of Notification Committee:

Gentlemen:

In accepting the nomination by the Republican party to the office of Chief Judge of the Fourth Judicial Circuit of Maryland I wish to acknowledge the debt I owe to the Republicans of the Circuit for the high honor they have conferred upon me.

The duties of a judge are of a non-political character but so long as there are political parties, and judges elected by the people, just so long will there be candidates for judicial honors nominated by their respective parties.

Regardless of the nomination of judicial candidates by political parties the people can be trusted to elect the proper candidate, and no party can hope to succeed which nominates unworthy men. The Republican party requires of its judicial nominee, that, if elected, he shall perform his duties faithfully, fearlessly, impartially and without perjudice. It asks nothing more, and it will not be satisfied with less.

This judicial contest is unique in it way. The minority party in the circuit, it being the majority party in the state, has nominated as its candidate a member of its party, chosen by reason of the fact that he is of its political faith, and has in its confessed weakness, for political purposes, declared that politics should not enter into the election of a judge. In other words this should be a non-partisan campaign.

In Maryland the election of the judiciary is vested in the people, and so long as the people elect there will be no such thing as a non-partisan bench. There can, however, and of right ought to be, a bi-partisan Court of Appeals in in this state, the personnel of which should reflect the relative strength of the two great political parties of the state.

The convention which you gentlemen represent declared for a more equitable distribution, politically, of the members of the Court of Appeal, and it is a proposition that should appeal to the sense of justice and fair-play of all citizens, regardless of their political affiliations.

I agree with my opponent, that political considerations should not weigh with a judge in the performance of his duties, and especially should this be true where the liberty and elective franchise of the citizen are involved. These are sacred rights of men from which party prejudice and political expediency should be entirely eliminated. There is nothing so fatal to the prestige of the Courts as to have it said that politics entered into a judicial decision.

Whether I have the character and ability necessary to the proper performance of the duties of the office to which I have been nominated, it is not for me to say. Those are matters for the citizen to determine for himself.

The Constitution of Maryland provides, that in order to qualify one for the bench, he shall be an attorney, not less than thirty nor more than seventy years of age, and that if a judge attains the age of seventy before the expiration of the term of his election, then the General Assembly may extend the time, in its discretion, "not to exceed the term for which he was elected." I am in my thirty-sixth year, and, if elected, would serve until in my fifty-first year. Can anyone say that these are not among the best years of one's life?

I have been in active practice for fourteen years, but have had no judicial experience, and it is not possible for one to have such experience unless he has been elected or appointed to the bench. I am, however, familiar with the requirements of the office of Chief Judge, and have sufficient confidence in myself to believe that I can satisfactorily discharge its duties.

I can assure the people of the Fourth Judicial Circuit that, if elected, I shall have no favorites among litigants and lawyers; that in all that may come before me, I shall constantly aim to be prompt, zealous, fair, impartial and free from prejudice.

I thank you, the convention you represent and the party represented by it for the great honor conferred upon me, and for the kind expressions of your approval of my candidacy.

Short addresses were made by Julius Renninger, Esq., of Oakland; Congressman Pearre, ex-Senator Wellington, F. Brooke Whiting, Esq., State's Attorney Robb and Richard J. Bruce. The fact that all the different factions of of the party in Allegany county were represented and had promised Mr. Sloan their united support, was favorably commented upon, and the opinion was freely expressed that from reliable reports received from the different sections of the three counties, Mr. Sloan would be elected by a majority of more than two thousand.

NEW RECORD FOR PIG IRON.

Enormous Sales of Steel Rails Reported and Shapes Equally In Demand.

The "Iron Trade Review" says:

"The continued activity of furnaces and mills is fortunately being accompanied by a strong conservative feeling, which is being manifested particularly in the opposition of mills to the making of contracts for delivery next year. During the past few days consumers of steel bars and other iron and steel products have been rather insistent in endeavoring to contract for future requirments, but leading interests are firmly resisting the making of contracts.

"Indications point to a new record of pig iron production this month. Last month the number of furnaces in operation was increased 20 and the production amounted to 2,232,642 tons. A number of stacks will be blown in this month and at Gary one new stack will be ready for blowing in each month during the remainder of the year. The four Gary stacks each will have a rated capacity of 13,500 tons per month.

"The Illinois Steel Company reports rail sales aggregating 100,000 tons, including 63,000 for the Chicago & Northwestern and 20,000 tons for a frog and switch company. The Carnegie Steel Company has sold to Wabash 2,500 tons for this year.

"Inquiries are near closing on about 20,000 tons additional. The Southern railroad has purchased 28,000 tons of open-hearth rails from the Tennessee Coal, Iron and Railroad Company, and is in the market for 150,000 pairs of rail joints.

"The leading interests has sold over a half million tons of scraps and plates to car building plants during the past few months. One recent order called for 13,000 tons. Four lake vessels ordered last week, will require about 16,000 tons of shapes and plates. The sales of the American Bridge Company for August amounted to 32,000 tons.

"Prices for fabricates show a much greater advance in the Chicago and Pittsburg districts than in Eastern territory. The demand for plates is very active, and the increased requirements of the Pressed Steel Car Company as a result of the settlement of the strike, will add to the troubles of the mills in that district in giving deliveries.

"Specifications on sheets are extremely heavy."

VALUE OF BEAUTY

How Tastefulness and Touches of Artistic Beauty pay.

The last thing to arrive in the development of the commercial spirit in America is the sense of the actual market value of beauty. In no country in the world have business and ugliness been so completely and persistently identified as in the United States. No St. Louisan, for example, desires to live in or very near to a manufacturing district, irrespective of noise, dust or odor, because the great majority of our factories are bare, square boxes of brick, angular and unadorned, without a hint of the shade of trees or the greenness of grass, and flanked by heaps of coke, pig iron and lumber. It in necessary to go to Belgium or Germany or to some place in the United States where foreign examples have taken root, as in parts of the manufacturing district of Moline, Ill., to see factories whose tasteful building are overrun with vines and bordered with well kept lawns, whose shrubs and trees are artistically disposed.

Such improvement pays. It increases the value of adjoining real estate and does away with the "no man's land" between factory and residence district. It rests the eye and the spirit and so makes for human efficiency.

The life of the busy man, whether clerk, merchant, mechanic or manufacturer, is divided into an industrial part and a domestic part, and the town in divided to to co respond. Anything that pushes the unavoidable ugliness of work into the realm of home life, that carries the strain of the day beyond the business district, is bad business. This the billboard does. It vulgarizes the residence districts of the town that permits it.

The domestic atmosphere of residence streets is as important to a town's well being as is the commercial atmosphere of business streets. The critical visitor and the would be resident are impressed in the business district by corwds, loaded trucks, full switches and other signs of business enterprise. No less are they impressed by the atmosphere of home in the residence district by streets where nothing meets the roadway, the white face of the sidewalks, the green grass and trees and the cheerful red walls of brick or soft tones of facades which rise sheer from the velvet turf. Whom does it benefit to place opposite such homes a 100 foot monstrosity advertising Dosem's pilis or Swillem's whisky?—St. Louis Republic.

Peach Orchard Land for Sale.

I offer for sale two farms in Hampshire county, W. Va., both in the peach belt and would make fine peach orchards.

The first contains 232 acres, forty acres cleared and the remainder in timber. About 50,000 feet of saw timber; 10,000 props and a lot of locust posts. Situated 1½ miles northwest of Springfield, on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. An orchard of sixty bearing apple trees and some peach trees on the place. About thirty acres of run bottom and five acres of this in meadow. Improved by dweeling house, well, etc.

I have been advised by good authority that this farm would make a splendid peach orchard. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,500, on easy terms.

The second farm contains about 150 acres, partly cleared and part in timber and has on it a dwelling house and some other improvements. About six acres of run bottom now in meadow. Situated about one mile west of Springfield, W. Va., on the Romney Branch of the B. & O. R. R. Convenient to churches, schools, stores, etc. Price $1,200, on easy terms. Address Dr. Percival Lantz, Alaska, W. Va. 7-tf

WATCH OAKLAND GROW.

A Modern City on the Crest of the Alleghany Mountains.

Oakland, the county seat of Garrett county, Maryland, is situated in a magnincent farming country. Agriculture being the true basis of all continued prosperity, this industry alone could support a city of several thousand people, where most crops of the temperate zone are produced and where total failures are wholly unknown. In addition to the staple crops of wheat, oats, corn, rye, potatoes, buckwheat, maple sugar, hay, etc., this section is a great apple country, and many varieties of fruits, berries and vegetables grow with little attention.

Yet, these are by no means all the advantages nature has so prodigally bestowed upon this community. Right at our doors are rich deposits of coal, kaolin, pure glass sand, fire and potters' clay, an inexhaustible supply of brick and tile shale, abundant supply of natural gas for lighting, heating and manufacturing purposes, the purest water on earth, a great supply of water power only waiting harness to illuminate this mountain top, and supply factories and electric railways with power.

Oakland is situated in the center of a plateau twenty by sixty miles in extent, two thousand eight hundred feet above the sea, where it is never too hot for comfort and never too cold for convenience; America's ideal summer resort; America's greatest health resort; where we sleep under two or more blankets all summer long and you, who reside in the lowlands or large centers of population, are sweltering with the heat and breathing humid, unhealthy and poisoned air. Here the drives are grand in prospect and glorious in nature's garb; where some new scene greets the vision at every turn of the road. $238,000.00 is being spent on State highways radiating from Oakland.

Come to Western Maryland, young man, and grow up with the country. If you prefer to invest in agricultural lands or fruit lands, you will find prices ranging from five to fifty dollars per acre, depending upon location and improvements. These are attractive investments without risk of loss. We also invite factories and industries of all kinds, and beheve that this location offers the best advantages on account of the abundance of raw material, cheap fuel and accessibility to market.

When you consider that right here, within six hours of the Nation's capital, is a country with almost unbounded resources, with a variety of everything: Water Works, Sewerage, Natural Gas, a healthy climate, where hay fever and many ills to which the human race is heir in less favored climes, is entirely unknown; a land of pure and abundant water, a land of churches and schools, without any race or other vexatious problems, and where the small investor along with the man of more pretentious capital has opportunities commensurate with his pluck, intelligence and energy, of an equal start in life, then you will readily concede the importance and correctness of the advice given herein.

"The Creator is still making people, but no more land." "There is a tide in the affairs of men which, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune and fame."

Don't miss the opportunity of a lifetime and regret it for years to come. "A word to the wise is sufficient." Oakland is on the boom, and you should get on the band wagon if you wish to be in the procession.

For further information, call on the Secretary of the Board of Trade, Oakland, Md.

STERN RESOLVE.

I'M weary of worry and wearing a face
As long as the road to Cheyenne,
Of cooking up troubles that never occur
And working them over again,
Of letting the little and no account ills
My feelings like sandpaper rub,
Of being downhearted with this and with that—
It's me for the Don't Worry club!

So easy it is to be all in a stew,
To sputter at nothing at all,
To be in hot water at least to the neck
Through trifles, no matter how small;
To conjure up shadows foreboding and dark
And give them a being to shun,
To pack airy nothings about on our back
As though they were weighing a ton!

We get without effort a peach of a krouch,
Allowing our fancies to dwell
On things that are hardly worth thinking about,
That eight for a nickel would sell.
Some molehill we constantly turn in our minds
Until like a mountain it seems,
And matters as large as the point of a pin
Play hob in the night with our dreams.

Avaunt, then, ye worries! Begone from my sight!
I'll have you no more in my train.
No more will I put on my glasses to look
For things over which to complain.
The Don't Worry club has a member in me.
The primrose lined passage is plain.
No matter what comes, be it little or great,
I'll smile, though it gives me a pain.

Gaging the Price.

"I can't talk to you. My time is worth money."

"I'll buy an hour of it."

"All right."

"Got change for a nickel?"

Found a Way.

"True happiness," said the garden philosopher, "consists in doing good to others."

"Does it?" dubiously asked the man with the ingrowing grouch.

"It does," replied the philosopher.

"Not for rational people," said the grouch. "I sat down with a street car hog today and kept jabbing him with my elbow and stepping on his toes until he wanted to fight. Say, I haven't been so happy for six months."

Imitative.

"That hat tag says 'Marked Down to $98.' I saw it myself last week for seventy-five."

"That is easy to understand."

"I can't see why he calls it marked down."

"He has been reading about the tariff lowering."

Still Hungry.

"I hit the boss for a raise today."

"Did you get it?"

"I should say not."

"Maybe his breakfast didn't agree with him."

"I guess it did, for I thought he was going to eat me up on top of it."

Different Location.

"Did Longfellow write 'Waiting at the Church?'"

"He did not."

"I thought he did."

"Well, you are mistaken."

"Oh, that's so. He was the fellow who stood on the bridge."

Preparation.

"What business did you advise him to go into?"

"The butter business."

"Does he know anything about it?"

"He ought to. He is a most persistent butter in."

Uncomfortable.

With pad on knee
And pen in fist
I try to give
My brain a twist.

I try to work
An item out
And think of what
To write about.

I try to turn
The current on,
But find the spark-
Ing plug is gone.

I only think
I'm hot and dry
And dry and hot—
And so am I!

EARLY CELERY

Department of Agriculture Bulletins on Use of Blanching Boards.

For early blanching on a small scale, such as would be employed on the farm or in the garden of the amateur horticulturalist, there are several methods. One of the most common is by means of boards placed on edge along each side of the row of celery. This method is also in general use for blanching large fields of early celery.

The boards used for blanching should be one inch thick by 12 to 14 inches wide and 12 to 16 feet long. The cheaper grades of pine will answer the purpose, but new boards are liable to impart an unpleasant flavor to the celery. The kinds used by growers in Michigan, Ohio and New York, at the rate now prevailing, cost $15 to $30 a thousand feet. In placing the boards in position slip one edge well under the outside leaves of the plants, then bringing this edge upward until in a vertical position along the row, having another board at the same time placed on the other side so that when in position there will be as little space between the boards as the thickness of the plants will permit. These boards, when used on a small scale only, may be fastened into position by means stakes driven in the ground, by nailing short pieces of laths across the top every six or eight feet, or by placing notched sticks over the tops of the boards. Any of these methods would be too inconvenient when applied on a larger scale, and a far better one is that practiced by large growers, namely, that of using double hooks, or spanners, about six inches long, made of heavy galvanized wire, bent somewhat in the shape of the thumb and first finger extended. These spanners are slipped over the upper edges of the boards every few feet to hold them together, and the plants are rigid enough to keep the boards in an upright position.

After the boards are in position it is a good plan to run a celery hiller between the rows, and to throw a little soil against the lower edges of the boards to close any openings that may result from the uneven surface of the soil.

Two or three week's time will be required to complete the blanching of the early varieties, and the boards must be kept in position until the crop is removed from the ground, after which they may be used again two or three times during the season. If the celery is allowed to remain in the boards too long after it has reached a marketable state, it loses in weight and flavor and is liable to be injured or even destroyed by the attacks of blight. This is especially true during the earlier part of the season, when the weather is warm. At the end of the season the boards should be piled flat, with strips inserted at every fourth or fifth course, and the whole pile roofed over to shed off rain; treated in this manner they will last from ten to twelve years.

Improving Native Sheep.

The mingling of new blood seems to give heavier feeders, more size and stronger constitutions, says the New Hampshire Farmer. At this station the breeding of rams of several pure breeds to native ewes has given marked results, especially with the cross of Dorset on natives. Yearling ewes in this flock being broader in back and near the type of mutton sheep, now weighing 125 pounds and shearing in May fleeces of eight and three-quarter pounds of wool of excellent length and strength of fiber, are the result of only one cross of a Dorset ram on native ewes never weighing over 95 pounds and shearing less than four pounds of wool.

Further improvement can be made by the weaning of the lambs in the summer; by doing this the ewes are given a chance to recuperate before the next breeding season. These lambs if put on fresh green pasture will also fatten and be in better market condition than if let run with the ewes until late fall.

A NEW VEGETABLE.

A Japanese Salad Plant That Is Meeting With Favor.

Without reservation of any description, we now positively pronounce this Japanese salad plant a decided acquisition to the American table and hence to the American vegetable grower. It is very difficult to describe it, says the New York Experiment Station Bulletin.

It "favors" both celery and asparagus, but is very different from either of them. Eaten raw it is simply delicious, and has struck all sorts of tastes, immediately becoming popular with old, middle aged and young of both sexes. Cooked, if cut up and stewed like celery, it makes an extremely pleasing addition to the list of creamed dishes. Cooked like asparagus and served with drawn butter, butter and vinegar, or any other asparagus dressing, it is just as marked a success.

We have proven conclusively that it can (by hilling) be cut in the open at any time from Christmas to the middle of the month of May. At Christmas extremely delicate blanched shoots from three to five inches long and from one-quarter to three-eighths inches in diameter are obtained. In April or May the stalks are from 8½ to 10 inches long and three-quarters to one and one-quarter inches in diameter. Six stalk equal the size of the regular bunch of asparagus, and these six stalks weigh one pound. It has many advantages over either celery or asparagus. Like asparagus, once planted it is always there, coming up annually and growing to a height of four or five feet. It is a bushy shrub with a small white flower and berries very much like elderberries. It can be started from either seeds or roots, as is asparagus. It demands no particular care, but occasional cultivation. Keeping it free from weeds will pay, as does this practice with all other crops.

On Long Island it requires no fertilizer of any description. It grows well in distinctly clayey loam, also in light sandy loam. Its yield per root is greater than asparagus. It can be cut freely the second year, and a test of four years shows that the stalks rapidly increase in number, in diameter and in height. Each new stalk, if left hilled up, throws out roots at joints under ground, hence having started a small patch it is an easy matter to secure plenty of plants for extending the beds. It can be introduced commercially through clubs, hotels and high-class restaurants. Like olives, asparagus and grape fruit, some people will have to learn to like it. But a plant that furnishes a clear white crisp stalk, without a particle of waste, that can be served whole or sliced lengthwise, like celery is served, that makes an extremely pleasing salad, and that can be stewed and creamed or served in any of the methods used for asparagus, certainly is entitled to a place on the American bill of fare.

WANT FARMERS TO KEEP BOOK.

Census Directors Want Them Prepared When They Gather Statistics.

Washington, Sept. 13.—Farm economists and scientists learned in agricultural problems, appointed as expert special agents for a brief term, are now in Washington assisting Census Director Durand and his staff in the formulation of the agricultural schedule of the thirteenth census so that the questions to be asked by the census enumerators shall be easily comprehended by the farmers of the country and so draw out the information ordered by congress to be ascertained. At the same time these practical steps are being taken by the census bureau, the farmers themselves will be called upon to help push the statistical plow over the country-wide field of farm data. It will be suggested by Director Durand to the farmers that the work of securing accurate returns at the coming census of agriculture, which will be taken April 15, 1910 at the same time as the count of population, will be greatly facilitated if the farmers will keep or provide some sort of written record of their farm operations during the year 1909. This effort to secure the farmers' personal co-operation is but one of a number of ways and means chosen in the effort to secure an accurate, expeditious and economical census concerning population, agriculture, manufactures, mines and quarries, which are the subjects of inquiry defined in the census law.

FULMINATION OF MURRAY VANDIVER.

The attention of voters who have hitherto seen no dishonor in their affiliatoin with the great party of Lincoln, Grant and McKinley, is called to a letter published on the front page of Thursday's Baltimore Sun, over the signature of Mr. Murray Vandiver, State Chairman of the Democratic party. It seems to us that this public letter of the official head of the Democratic party in Maryland, in which he stigmatizes past and present members of the Republican party as "carpet-baggers," and "foul birds of prey," is a direct and deadly insult to the Republican party, but as to this we leave the rank and file of the party to judge, and will be content with their verdict. Mr. Vandiver is perhaps to be congratulated upon the possession of a remarkable sense of the eternal fitness of things when, for the political condition of Democratic rule, of which he boasts, he gives thanks not to the God of Christianity, but to the Mohammedan deity worshipped in the despotic land of the passe Abdul Hamid on the banks of the Bosphorus. We quote below excerpts from Mr. Vandiver's letter showing the opinion which the Democratic party entertains of the Republican party and all things Republican. In Thursday's Baltimore Sun, Democratic State Chairman Vandiver, among other things, used the following language:

"From 1852, when the Whig party went down in final extinction, to the Reconstruction era, the Democratic party practically held the entire South. Corruption in politics was unknown. The electorate was pure and intelligent; the representatives in the national congress and in the State legislature were men of high ability and of character beyond reproach; government was honestly, efficiently and economically administered. Then came that cursed, unholy era of Re-construction, so-called, and for a series of dismal calamitous years the Southern States were one-party States, but not Democratic. Republican carpet-baggers, foul birds of prey, the worst scum of the earth, swarmed down upon the South, and with the aid of this cursed negro suffrage, which it is contended should still be hung to the neck of Maryland, cast into chains the whole section. My God, what chains they were. It is an oft told tale, and iteration may weary, but the day can never come when every noble heart will not throb with horror and indignation at the record of the government of those Republican one-party State. The unhappy people were not put to the sword by their Republican rulers. It would have been a better fate for many. Pillage and rapine ran riot; the States were poverty-stricken to the last degree; all public and private enterprise was stifled and a whole people almost literally left starving. Now, mark the contrast. Little by little at first, and then more vigorously and rapidly, those State's loosened the Republican chains that bound them. One after another, they at last shook off the hideous fetters altoge her. They are still one-party States, but, blessed be Allah, not Republican."

In the above words, Mr. Murray Vandiver, Democratic State chairman, discloses the determination of the Democratic party to convert Maryland into a one-party State, and at the same time utters a foul libel on the Republican party. If adherence to principle is still alive in the Republican party—and we know that it is—and if red blood still courses in the veins of its members, this atrocious and official slander of our party, published broadbast by the titular head of the Democratic party, can have but one result. It will arouse in the breast of every Republican a spirit of honest, patriotic and unalterable resentment. It will arm every member of our party with an invincible determination to defeat the Straus amendment and elect every nominee on our ticket by overwhelming majorities. Confronted as we are by an arrogant and powerful foe, whose self-confessed design is to destroy the Republican party in Maryland this is no time for doubt, for quibbling or for hair-splitting. We must lay aside every personal and factional difference of the past and present, a united front to the common army. The life of the Republican party is at stake. Our whole ticket must be elected and the Straus amendment forever buried beneath an avalanche of votes. The grand old party expects every Republican to do his duty.

HIS LATEST OUTBREAK.

The good people of Garrett county were hardly prepared for the lurid letter that emanated from the versatile pen of Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill through the columns of the Garrett Journal last week, in which he undertook to try his so-called libel case against the editor of THE REPUBLICAN, and in which he descended to the lowest depths of billingsgate and personal abuse.

People who are acquainted with this gentleman are aware that he is given to great outbursts of temper, but that he was adept in the art of calling people liars was left for him to demonstrate to the entire satisfaction of the community in the article referred to. Possibly some people who are afflicted with the same kind of disorder, applauded this supreme effort of Mr. Hamill to let the public know just how he felt and in what chaste and charming language he could pour out the long pent-up vials of his wrath.

So far as we are able to judge Mr. Hamill's mentality is especially disturbed every time a reference is made to his connection with the great Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, but we see nothing in this that should disturb his tranquility or cause him the slightest disquietude and upset his peace of mind. Surely it is no disgrace to be connected with the greatest corporation in the State of Maryland, to be its representative in the greatest county of the State, and to enjoy the prestige resulting from such relationship Its practical immunity from taxation gives it a warm place in the hearts of the people of Maryland, no doubt, and enjoying this great degree of popular esteem, its servants and representatives should feel at all times that they, too, are the peculiar objects of this same kind of public affection and regard.

We regret that Mr. Hamill descended to the depths to which temper led him Were we to reply in kind we should be putting ourselves upon his level. We feel sorry for him in his plight and we believe that the better element of the community joins with us in this expression of sympathy. Mr. Hamil has reached the age where youthful indiscretion in statement should give way to the calm, deliberate judgment and correct expression of advancing years. Mr. Hamill is considerably along on the shady side of life and it is hoped that in his declining years he will lose all asperity of temper and permit the sweet and mollifying influences of beautiful old age to draw around him the love, affection and high regard of our great hearted people.

A TWO-PARTY STATE.

Governor Crothers in his speech at the Lyric meeting, inspired by a tremendously sympathetic audience, declared: "They say that the ratification of the amendment will make this a one-party state. Why, it is a one-party state now, and it will be as long as we have negro voters."

If Maryland is now a one-party state there is no such thing among the states of this Union as a two-party state. It is not necessary to go back to the sweeping result of the election of 1895 to show that the long-dominant party had arrived at a period when its hold upon power had become precariously uncertain. There has not been a general election in this state since 1895 when the result immediately preceding the election not been a matter of doubt. Governor Crothers himself was elected by a small plurality. At the last congressional election this state equally divided its representation in the House branch of the national assembly, and even in the state legislature of 1908 there was an able and aggressive minority representation which exerted an incalculable modifying influence upon a body which, to put it very mildly, greatly needed critical watching. There is, in fact, in this state a large independent vote, which, under present conditions, holds the balance of power between the two parties.

As every discriminating observer is aware, the disfranchisement scheme is really designed to eliminate the independent vote in this state—to render it of no effect. If the existing wholesome balance between the two parties is destroyed the organization bosses who have made of the Democratic party a close corporation can do what they please in the way of making tickets and electing them. They can put up a type of candidate which, under existing circumstances, they would not dare to nominate. The independent vote may then swing to the other side without avail, for the 15,000 independents in the state could not counterbalance the 50,000 disfranchised. With the complete control of the electoral machinery of the Democratic party the organization which even now does things in the name of the party would so entrench its position that not in the next quarter of a century, perhaps not in half a century, would it be possible to break the grip of the bosses.

The disfranchising amendment is designed to destroy the wholesome balance of power between the two parties in this state. It means that, and nothing else.

LET "WELL ENOUGH ALONE."

Rev. Dr. Henry M. Wharton, pastor of Brantly Baptist Church, took occasion yesterday morning to preface a sermon with a few remarks about the disfranchising amendment which are the more interesting in that they come from a minister who is at the same time a Democrat and a man who has been closely identified with the South for a lifetime. Dr. Wharton said in part:

"To accomplish the purpose of the proposed amendment may work injury to deserving white men of foreign birth to some extent, and the wheat might be pulled up along with the tares. Besides if the negro vote should be taken out of politics it would give the Democratic party such supreme control that corruption might—I dare say would inevitably—follow. Perhaps we had better let "well enough alone." The negro is our ward. We are his guardians. In the providence of God, he is on our hands and we must take care of him. The amendment is absolutely unnecessary. We had better leave things as they are."

If the amendment is not absolutely unnecessary, as Dr Wharton points out, it remains for somebody to show wherein its adoption will improve the condition of either the white man or the black man in Maryland. With its present overwhelming majority in the Legislature, the Democratic party does not need another vote in either house to pass any law or to enact any reform it wishes to grant the State. The possibility of this becoming a boss-ridden Commonwealth in the event of the elimination of the negro vote is undeniable. The time to let "well enough alone," as Dr. Wharton suggests, is when asked to make a radical change, a change which, at best, can be productive of little good, and which may be productive of a very great deal of harm.—Monday's Baltimore News.

THE BALTIMORE SUN'S GLOWING TRIBUTE TO THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

(Sun Editorial, October 30, 1897.)

In spite of spoilsmen in the City Council and Legislature, the Republican administration has actually accomplished more in the direction of good government during its brief tenure of power than the bosses did from 1875 to 1895. The facts speak for themselves. Put political prejudice aside and look at them. Here they are: (1) an excellent election law, with reputable Supervisors of Elections, under which the frauds of the Gorman-Rasin machine are impossible; (2) a business-like management of the city's finances, which has avoided the creation of floating debts and has provided honestly for the sinking funds; (3) notable improvement in the efficiency of the police and fire service; (4) the streets better cleaned than ever before, at a greatly reduced cost; (5) reduction of legislative expenses, of printing expenses, of State insurance and other similar items; (6) an assessment law, which, though not perfect, was passed in answer to the popular demand and the promise of the Republican platform. In summing up the benefits derived from the election of 1895, the blessing of an independent and thoroughly honest executive in the City Hall should not be forgotten. Mayor Hooper's example in that position will be a permanent influence and inspiration toward better things for many years to come.

GARRETT COUNTY BREADSTUFFS

The Cultivation of Cereal Crops in Garrett County.

To the Editor of The Republican:

For many years it was the belief among farmers that wheat could not be cultivated to any advantage in Garrett county and they so acted in far back years. Then only a small spot of wheat would be seeded for a little wheaten bread to be used on special occasions. Rye was almost the only winter grain produced, and was mainly the breadstuff in those days. Buckwheat was extensively cultivated and was used in the winter for bread in its dark state long before the roller process flour came into use, which is a great improvement on the old way. By this method buckwheat cakes are much more desirable and tasteful than by the old way. Oats were also extensively cultivated. They have some cereal qualities, but the grain was almost exclusively used for horse feed. In those days at 25 cents to 30 cents per bushel, there was much demand for it along the old National Road by hotel and tavern keepers when the old National highway was in its palmy days. It is now like an ordinary county road. It ought to have new life.

But the farmers of late years in Garrett county have found that winter wheat can be cultivated to even greater advantage in this mountain county than in the old counties below. As an instance, Mr. G. Broadwater, near Grantsville, this season produced 225 bushels from a five acre field—45 bushels to the acre. This was an extraordinary yield, and much above the usual scale in the old wheat growing counties of our state. There are other farmers in the county who have had products nearly equal to the one named. It will thus be seen that the wheat crop is by far the most profitable of all the grain raising, and should be so treated and considered.

Let it be remembered that the wheat product now in this country is not on the increase, but the demand and consumption are largely on the increase, with advances in price. Therefore there are good reasons and inducements for our farmers to enlarge their wheat fields. It has been realized that the mountain climate is not unfavorable to the growth of wheat. The lands in Garrett county are less exhausted than the old farms in the counties below us. Besides there is much land which can yet be turned into farms.

The remarkable exploit of Jennings Brothers in converting an exhausted timber forest into productive wheat land is an inducement for the conversion of similar ground into wheat growing land.

As wheat now produces more to the acre than any other grain, with nearly double the price over the latter, it would seem plain that the former cereal should be preferable in the production of any grain. Let the junior county of our good old state start anew on the chief of the cereal grains. J. B.

NEW GERMANY.

Farmers are plowing potatoes and cutting corn.

Our school opened with an enrollment of sixteen under the care of Miss Lulu Warnick.

Mr. Stephen Broadwater spent last Thursday in Frostburg.

Miss Lulu Warnick spent Saturday and Sunday with her parents near Grantsville.

Messrs. George Durst, Ernest Wiland and Frank Stephens, who have been working in West Virginia, are home again.

Messrs. Sam Otto and James Durst were attending the fair at Meyersdale, Pa., last Thursday.

BITTINGER.

The scheme for an independent people's ticket was a dead failue, so far as this district is concerned, as not a single individual appeared on last Saturday afternoon to hold the primary election for which a call had been made.

Rev. J. B. Shoup returned from his western trip last Saturday afternoon and is now at the home of his daughter in this village, and we are sorry to report his physical condition as rather serious.

Mrs. Brininger, of Sunnyside, is spending this week with her daughter, Mrs. J. Turner Lohr, at this place.

Ray McCullough and Miss Lizzie Welsh, of Friendsville, spent a few hours last Sunday in this village as the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Asa Orendorf.

Samuel Peck, of McHenry, passed through this village one day last week.

A party of ladies from Jennings came to this village one day last week laden with good things for Rev. and Mrs. Yugel, and after spending the afternoon very pleasantly at the parsonage, returned to their homes on the evening train.

John H. Stark and wife, of this place, spent a few days last week visiting friends at and near Confluence, Pa.

Harry and Charles Wiley, of this village, spent two days last week attending the fair at Meyersdale, Pa.

Rev Alvin Yugel made a business trip to Oakland and Cumberland last week.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mr. Lloyd Biggs, who has moved into Roslyn cottage, has formed a copartnership with Mr. A. L. Callis in the plumbing business.

Natural gas is already in use and is being put into the business houses, residences and churches—in Loch Lynn—not in Mountain Lake Park.

Mr. and Mrs. C. V. Leighton are at Atlantic City. Mr. Leighton will also purchase fall and winter goods while on the eastern trip.

Mr. A. W. Miller, late of Bond, this county, has leased the Callis blacksmith shop and is prepared to do all kinds of work in his line. His family will occupy a house in Loch Lynn.

The new Baptist church is now being plastered by Mr. Whorton, and will soon be completed and dedicated.

Mr. Gay W. Hayden has been clerking at the Mountain Lake Hotel for the past month.

Mr. Albert Biggs has moved from the Fern cottage in Mt. Lake Park to a house in Loch Lynn.

Mr. R. T. Miller, who purchased the Alderton cottage and now occupies it with his family, will be a permanent resident of the Park. They are from Marietta, Ohio, and are very worthy people.

Mr. Lloyd Crane and family, who conducted the Alleghany House this season, are visiting relatives in Friendsville district.

Professor and Mrs. J. P. Hillis, who have been occupying their cottage here this season, left Tuesday morning to attend a convention in Iowa.

Judge T. H. Cuppett is here making improvements to his cottage which he will occupy permanently soon.

Our schools in the immediate neighborhood are being conducted this term as follows: Mt. Lake Park, by Misses Anna DeBerry and Rose Wilson; Loch Lynn, by Miss Ruth Rudisill and the Close School by Miss Cora Weimer.

Mr. and Mrs. Winchell left Monday for a short visit among friends.

Hon. Philip Willett delivered a lecture last Friday night in Piedmont.

Mr. Wesley Rudisill has been appointed contracting engineer for a large electrical syndicate with headquarters in North Carolina.

Dr. McIntyre, who had located for the practice of medicine in Loch Lynn, has moved to Littleton, W. Va.

Mrs. Adam Long was taken to the Western Maryland Hospital at Cumberland last Sunday, accompanied by Dr. J. E. Legge, where she was operated on for cancer Tuesday morning. She is now doing well with every indication of a permanent cure.

Mr. Upton Cuppett will furnish our people with coal from the Tower mine again this winter.

Preaching in the M. E. church Sunday evening at 8 o'clock. This will be the last preaching service this conference year.

Mr. Doman, at his new mill in Loch Lynn, is now prepared to gring buckwheat, corn, etc.

STOYER.

The weather is very favorable at this writing.

Buckwheat is not so good on account of dry weather.

Miss Grace Riley was visiting at Mrs. E. E. Tasker's, near Kurtz Chapel, last Sunday.

Mrs. Jonas Gainer, of St. George, is visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Capt. White, of this place.

Mrs. M. S. Harvey was seen in town Sunday evening.

Messrs. Waitman Stoyer and Chas. Kidd and Misses Bessie Stoyer and Ida Harvey were calling on friends near Deer Park last Sunday.

Mr. Bell White and wife were visiting at J. T. Stoyer's last Wednesday.

Mr. Scott Harvey was in town Sunday.

Mr. V. H. Foley, of Mt. Storm, visited our town last Saturday evening. Sunday morning no trace of him could be found. Attractions must be great.

Miss Bessie Stoyer was visiting at the home of Rev. Idleman last Friday.

Mrs. Winters and children, of Midland, were visiting at Thos. Melvin's Sunday.

A merry crowd of our young people attended the illustrated lecture at White church last Thursday night. All report a good time.

Mr. Mike Tasker is helping Mr. Jack Wilson haul logs this week.

Mrs. Oscar Wolfe, of Kitzmiller, was visiting in town Sunday.

Mrs. E. E. Tasker, of Kurtz Chapel, visited friends here last Wednesday. She expects to go to Oklahoma and New Mexico soon, where she is going to homestead. Her daughter Emily will accompany her.

According to a report published in the Cumberland Times Capt. P. A. Chisholm, of Oakland, is responsible for the statement that pheasants will be more plentiful during the hunting season this year than they have been in a number of years past.

The exhibit of farm products at the real estate office of Mr. E. S. West in Oakland last Saturday exceeded the expectations of many. The farmers and others responded to Mr. West's invitation generally, bringing corn, potatoes, beets, sugar beets, pumpkins, turnips, cauliflower, cabbage, canteloupes, oats, buckwheat, wheat, barley, tomatoes, squash, grapes, millet, apples, peaches, cucumbers, children, etc. The office was crowded nearly the entire day with interested spectators and exhibitors.

Mr. Fred. Furbee, recently of Oakland, but for the past year a resident of Denver, Colorado, arrived in Oakland last Saturday night and remained here until yesterday afternoon on a visit to friends, leaving for Keyser, where he will visit his brother before returning west.

Mr. Henry Blocher, of District No. 9, accompanied by Mr. Olin D. Robeson, of the same section, were callers at this office yesterday afternoon. Other representative residents of No. 9 who visited Oakland yesterday were Messrs. Thomas H. Layman, James Carey and Frank C. Graham.

HEALTH OFFICER AT KENDALL.

Prevalence of Typhoid Fever There Necessitated His Presence.

Last Friday Health Officer Henry W. McComas, of Oakland, went to Kendall where there are at present seven cases of typhoid fever, for the purpose of making an observation and to trace the cause of the outbreak to its source.

Dr. McComas upon investigation gave it as his opinion, after his return to Oakland, that there is a reasonable suspicion that the cause of the disease is found in the water supply, it being his opinion that pollution exists and to gnard other communities against typhoid he has requested this paper to print the following terse suggestions:

Whenever occasion to suspect the purity of water arises, it would be well to boil all water for drinking purposes; also all water used in cleansing cooking and eating utensils, milk receptacles, etc.

Whenever and wherever a case of typhoid exists the nurse or attendant in charge of the patient should be extremely careful in burying the excretions after having thoroughly disinfected the same with a solution of sulphate of copper or chloride of lime, both of which are efficient destroyers of typhoid germs and are easily and cheaply procured. The deposits should be made in a pit and covered with earth immediately. Care and good judgment should govern the location of the pit so that it would be impossible for it to drain into wells or springs.

REV. J. B. WORKMAN.

Pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church of Oakland, and secretary of the West Virginia Conference, who will leave here next Tuesday morning for Mannington, W. Va., to attend the sixty-third annual gathering of the ministers of his denomination. Mr. Workman has diligently looked after the spiritual welfare of his flock during the past five years and by his endeavors has in great measure made the local church strong in members and helpful spiritually. Mr. Workman's return as pastor of St. Paul's will be pleasing not alone to the membership of that church but to others as well.

A Wonderful Curiosity.

Mr. Charles A. Ashby, who owns an extensive farm adjacent to Deer Park, in the course of his labors in some new ground one day last week, brought to surface a curiously carved stone, which from appearance has been in the ground for perhaps centuries, certainly antedating the discovery of America by Columbus. The stone, about eight inches in length is cut at an angle of nearly or quite forty-five degrees and upon one end is depicted the head and face of some animal, possibly the wolf, while on the opposite end is the face of a human, well proportioned and extremely well preserved, thenose alone having corroded leaving the outline, however, which is plainly discernable. At the angle of the stone a hole has been drilled or cut through. Those who have examined the image are of the opinion that it was a god of some race of people who inhabited this country at one time and the purposes of the hole the stone was to enable it to be suspended at a sufficient height so that the worshippers would be looked down upon by either one or the other faces carved thereon.

Some Advice to Trustees.

There seems to be a prevailing opinion among trustees that by striking out the phrase, "from term to term and from year to year," from teachers contracts, that teachers are hired for one year only, and cannot hold the school longer than one year. Such is not the case, however, as trustees do not have the power to change contracts. Any teacher, therefore, can hold a school until some good reason is found why he should not hold the school longer. This precaution, therefore, is unnecessary.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MR. ELLITHORP

A Fishing Trip, Indian Burial Customs, etc., In the Northwest.

PRESTON, MINN., Sept. 20, 1909.

Editor of THE REPUBLICAN:

The frost of September 1st did no damage in this section. Corn is about out of the way of frost; some is being cut.

We were delayed one day starting North; we started on September 8th. Left Preston at 12.30 p. m. and arrived at Minneapolis at 8 p. m. Enroute we passed through a fertile country and many prosperous towns, among them Austin, Owatonna, Fairbault and Northfield. The latter is where the famous Jesse James and the Younger brothers came to grief away back in the seventies. It is a town of 5,000 inhabitants, 42 miles from Minneapolis. It has three railroads, the Great Western, Rock Island and Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul. It is a prosperous and wealthy town. We spent one day at the state fair, which was going on between Minneapolis and St. Paul. Minneapolis has a population of 310,000. There were 45,000 people at the fair on Sept. 9th. I am not stuck on Minneapolis; while it is a busy business place they will come as near robbing one as any city I was ever in. They charged 10 cents for a glass of ginger ale and other things in proportion. Whether the dealers try to fleece the fair visitors or whether it is the general make up I am not informed. My wife and our cousin Darius Broadwater were with me on this trip. We visited Minnehaha Falls and Minnehaha Park. It is a fine place and there are many species of wild animals kept there. Saturday morning at 9.30 we left for Sandstone, 86 miles from Minneapolis, on the Great Northern railroad, arriving there at 12 noon. After dinner we hired a man with an auto to take us 18 miles in the country. It was a great trip. Sometimes we rode, sometimes we walked, sometimes we pushed. The road is a fairly good one, only there are short sandy hills and the loose sand caused all our grief, but we finally got there. Fishing was fine; the largest catch was a pickerel two and a-half feet long and a five pound bass. We also caught a lot of smaller ones. Some of the lakes are so full of wild rice that it is almost impossible to fish in them.

The Indians were about through gathering their winter supply of wild rice. We visited the Indian village and their burying ground. They have a bed quilt put on a flag pole at a grave; they also put a feather bed, a quilt and their gun and tobacco pouch and money in the coffin, as well as their hat and blanket. They wrap their dead in a blanket and then wrap them in pink cheese cloth, then they make a little coop over the grave, like a chicken coop, with a small opening in one end, and every day for a while they put something in at the opening to feed the spirit until they get acquainted in their Happy Hunting Ground.

We spent a week in Pine county and left Sandstone on Saturday, Sept. 18th at 8.20 a. m., on the slowest train I ever traveled on. Had we been in a hurry we would have walked, but not being rushed we rode through to Minneapolis, remained there about three hours and then came to Preston. A lady had a sick cow and called a veterinary surgeon. After diagnosing the case he said it was a bad case of strangulated hydrophobia.

Expect to be in old Garrett county next month if all goes well.

Mid-Week Services.

Rev. C. P. Bassman, pastor of the Keyser (W. Va.) Lutheran church, will preach in St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, Oakland, on Thursday and Friday evenings, Sept. 23 and 24, preparatory to the Communion services in the church Sunday morning, the 26th inst.

Dedication Services.

The new Methodist Episcopal church at Jennings, this county, will be dedicated on Sunday, September 26th, 1909. The Rev. Dr. R. B. Ward will preach the dedicatory sermon at 10:30 a. m. on the above date. All are cordially invited to attend. A special invitation to all former pastors of the Grantsville circuit.

D. A. FRIEND,
Pastor.

Dr. and Mrs. J. K. Mitchell spent a few days at the Deer Park Hotel last week. The Mitchells did not occupy their Deer Park cottage, "Four Winds," this year, but will have possession of it next season. Dr. Mitchell spent the summer on the coast of Maine, but after all, he says, there is no spot like Garrett county.

Paring Corns Proved Fatal.

George Galloway, aged 65 years, of Oakland, Md., died at the Western Maryland Hospital here Tuesday night, from blood po soning, which came from gangrene. He pared corns with a pocketknife a month ago and the fatal malady resulted. He was brought to the hospital here about three weeks ago and a portion of the right leg was amputated below the knee. Galloway was a bachelor and had been a laborer on a farm near Oakland.—Cumberland News

PEARY'S CONQUEST OF THE FAR NORTH

Explorer's Own Account of His Wonderful and Successful Dash to the Pole.

A Story That Is as Fascinating as if Taken From the "Arabian Nights."

Copyright, 1909, by the New York Times Company.

BATTLE HARBOR, Labrador (via Marconi wireless, Cape Ray, N. F.), Sept. 9.—The steamer Roosevelt, bearing the north polar expedition of the Peary Arctic club, parted company with the Erik and steamed out of Etah Ford late in the afternoon of Aug. 18, 1908, setting the usual course for Cape Sabine. We had on board 22 Eskimo men, 17 women and 10 children, 226 dogs and some forty odd walrus.

We encountered the ice a short distance from the mouth of the harbor, but it was not closely packed and was negotiated by the Roosevelt without serious difficulty. As we neared Cape Sabine the weather cleared somewhat, and we passed close by Three Voort island and Cape Sabine, easily making out with the naked eye the house at Hayes Harbor occupied by me in the winter of 1901-2.

From Cape Sabine north there was so much water that we thought of setting the lug sail before the southerly wind, but a little later appearance of ice to the northward stopped this. There was clean open water to Cape Albert and from there scattered ice to a point about abreast of Victoria head, thick weather and dense ice bringing us some ten or fifteen miles away.

From here we drifted south somewhat and then got a slant to the northward out of the current. We worked a little farther north and stopped again for some hours. Then we again worked westward and northward till we reached a series of lakes, coming to a stop a few miles south of the Windward's winter quarters at Cape Durville. From here, after some delay, we slowly worked a way northeastward through fog and broken ice of medium thickness through one night and the forenoon of the next day, only emerging into open water and clear weather off Cape Fraser. From this point we had a clear run through the middle of Robeson channel to Lady Franklin Bay. Here we encountered both ice and fog and were forced across to the Greenland coast at Thank God Harbor.

The fog lifted there and enabled us to make out our whereabouts, and we steamed north through a series of leads past Cape Lupton and thence southward toward Cape Union. A few miles off that cape we were stopped by impracticable ice, and we drifted back south to Cape Union, where we stopped again.

Twice Forced Aground.

We lay for some time in a lake of water and then to prevent being drifted south again took refuge under the north shore of Lincoln Bay.

Twice we were forced aground by the heavy ice. We had our port quarter rail broken and a hole stove in in the bulwarks, and twice we pushed out in an attempt to get north, but we were forced back each time to our precarious shelter.

Finally on Sept. 2 we squeezed around Cape Union and made fast in a shallow niche in the ice, but after some hours we made another short run to Black Cape and hung on to a grounded bit of ice. At last, a little after midnight of Sept. 5, we passed through extremely heavy running ice into a stream of open water, rounded Cape Rawson and passed Cape Sheridan.

Within a quarter of an hour of the same time we arrived three years before—7 a. m., Sept. 5—we reached the open water extending beyond Cape Sheridan.

We steamed up to the end of it, and it appeared practicable at first to reach Porter Bay, near Cape Joseph Henley which I had for my winter quarters But, the outlook being unsatisfactory I went back and put the Roosevelt into the only opening in the floe, being barred close to the mouth of the Sheridan river, a little north of our position three years prior.

The season was further advanced than in 1905. There was more snow on the ground, and the new ice inside the floe bergs was much thicker. The work of discharging the ship was commenced at once and rushed to completion. The supplies and equipment we sledged across ice and sea and deposited on shore. A house and workshop were built of boards, covered with sails and fitted with stoves, and the ship was snug for the winter in shoal water, where she touched bottom at low tide. This settlement on the stormy shores of the Arctic ocean was christened Hubbardville.

Moving the Supplies.

On Sept. 15 the full work of transporting supplies to Cape Columbia was inaugurated. Marvin, with Dr Goodsell and Borup and the Eskimos, took sixteen sledge loads of supplies to Cape Belknap, and on the 27th the same party started with loads to Porter Bay. The work of hunting and transporting supplies was prosecuted continuously by the members of the party and the Eskimos until Nov. 5.

On Oct. 1 I went on a hunt with two Eskimos across the field and Parr Bay and the peninsula, made the circuit of Clements Markham inlet and returned to the ship in seven days with fifteen musk oxen, a bear and a deer.

Professor McMillan went to Columbia in November and obtained a month of tidal observations, returning in December. In the December moon Borup moved the Hecla depot to Cape Colan. In the February moon Bartlett went to Cape Hecla, Goodsell moved some more supplies from Hecla to Cape Colon, and Borup went to Markham inlet on a hunting trip. On Feb. 15 Bartlett left the Roosevelt with his division for Cape Columbia and Parr Bay. Goodsell, Borup, McMillan and Hansen followed on successive days with their provisions. Marvin returned from Bryants on Feb. 17 and left for Cape Columbia Feb. 21. I brought up the rear Feb. 22.

The total of all divisions leaving the Roosevelt was 7 members of the party, 59 Eskimos, 140 dogs and 23 sledges. By Feb. 27 such of the Cape Colan depot as was needed had been brought up to Cape Columbia, the dogs were rested and double rationed and harnessed and the sledges and other gear overhauled.

Hewing Through Ice.

Four months of northerly winds during the fall and winter instead of southerly ones, as during the previous season, led me to expect less open water than before, and I was prepared to hew a road through the jagged ice for the first hundred miles or so and then cross the big lead.

On the last day of February Bartlett, with his pioneer division, accomplished this, and his division got away due north over the ice on March 1. The remainder of the party got away on Bartlett's trail, and I followed an hour later.

The party now comprised 7 members of the expedition, 17 Eskimos, 133 dogs and 19 sledges. One Eskimo and seven dogs had gone to pieces.

A strong easterly wind, drifting snow and temperature in the minus marked our departure from the camp at Cape Columbia, which I had christened Crane City. Rough ice in the first march damaged several sledges and smashed two beyond repair, the teams going back to Columbia for other sledges in reserve there.

We camped ten miles from Crane City. The easterly wind and low temperature continued. In the second march we passed the British record made by Markham in May, 1876—82.20—and were stopped by open water, which had been formed by the wind after Bartlett passed. In this march we negotiated the lead and reached Bartlett's third camp. Borup had gone back from here, but missed his way, owing to the faulting of the trail by the movement of the ice.

Marvin came back also for more fuel and alcohol. The wind continued forming open water all about us. At the end of the fourth march we came upon Bartlett, who had been stopped by a wide lake of open water. We remained here from March 4 to March 11. At noon of March 5 the sun, red and shaped like a football by excess of reflection, just raised itself above the horizon for a few minutes and then disappeared again. It was the first time I had seen it since Oct. 1.

I now began to feel a good deal of anxiety because there were no signs of Marvin and Borup, who should have been there for two days. Besides, they had the alcohol and oil, which were indispensable for us. We concluded that they had either lost the trail or were imprisoned on an island by open water, probably the latter.

Across Eighty-fourth Parallel.

Fortunately, on March 11 the lead was practicable, and, leaving a note for Marvin and Borup to push on after us by forced marches, we proceeded northward. During this march we crossed the eighty-fourth parallel and traversed a succession of just-frozen leads from a few hundred yards to a mile in width.

On the 14th we got free of the leads and came on decent going. While we were making camp a courier from Marvin came and informed me he was on the march in the rear. The temperature was 50 below.

The following morning, March 14, I sent Hansen with his division north to pioneer a trail for five marches, and Dr. Goodsell, according to the program, started back to Cape Columbia. At night Marvin and Borup came spinning in with their men and dogs steaming in the bitter air like a squadron of battleships. Their arrival relieved me of all anxiety as to our oil supply.

In the morning I discovered that McMillan's foot was badly frostbitten. The mishap had occurred two or three days before, but McMillan had said nothing about it in the hope that it would come out all right. A glance at the injury showed me that the only thing was to send him back to Cape Columbia at once. The arrival of Marvin and Borup enabled me to spare sufficient men and dogs to go back with him.

This early loss of McMillan was seriously disappointing to me. He had a sledge all the way from Cape Columbia, and with his enthusiasm and the powers and physique of the trained athlete I had confidence in him for at least the eighty-sixth parallel, but there was no alternative.

The best sledges and dogs were selected and the sledge loads brought up to the standard. The sounding gave a depth of 325 fathoms. We were over the continental shelf, and, as I had surmised, the successive leads crossed in the fifth and sixth marches composed the big lead and marked the continental shelf.

On leaving this camp the expedition comprised 16 men, 12 sledges and 100 dogs. The next march was satisfactory as regards distance and character of going. In the latter part there were pronounced movements in the ice, both visible and audible. Some leads were crossed, in one of which Borup and his team took a bath, and we were finally stopped by an impracticable lead opening in front of us.

We camped in a temperature of 50 below. At the end of two short marches we came upon Hansen and his party in camp, mending their sledges. We devoted the remainder of the day to overhauling and mending sledges and breaking up our damaged ones for material.

The next morning I put Marvin in the lead to pioneer the trail, with instructions to make two forced marches to bring up our average, which had been cut down by the last two short ones. Marvin carried out his instructions implicitly. A considerable amount of young ice assisted in this.

At the end of the tenth march, latitude 85.23, Borup turned back in command of the second supporting party, having traveled a distance equivalent to Nansen's distance from this far to his farthest north.

From this point the expedition comprised 13 men, 10 sledges and 70 dogs. It was necessary for Marvin to take a sledge from here, and I put Bartlett and his division in advance to pioneer the trail.

The continual daylight enabled me to make a moderation here that brought my advance and main parties closer together and reduced the likelihood of their being separated by open leads.

After Bartlett left camp with Henderson and their division Marvin and I remained with our divisions twenty hours longer and then followed. When we reached Bartlett's camp he broke out and went on and we turned in. By this arrangement the advance party was traveling while the main party was asleep, and vice versa, and I was in touch with my advance party every twenty-four hours.

I had no reason to complain of the going for the next two marches, though for a less experienced party, less adaptable sledges or less perfect equipment it would have been an impossibility.

Last Words to Marvin.

At our position at the end of the second march Marvin obtained a satisfactory sight for latitude in clear weather, which placed us at 85.48. This result agreed very satisfactorily with the dead reckoning of Marvin, Bartlett and myself. Up to this time the slight altitude of the sun had made it not worth while to waste time in observations.

On the next two marches the going improved, and we covered good distances. In one of these marches a lead delayed us a few hours. We finally ferried across on the ice cakes.

The next day Bartlett let himself out, evidently for a record, and reeled off plump twenty miles. Here Marvin obtained a satisfactory sight on latitude, which gave the position as 86.38, or beyond the farthest north of Nansen and Abruzzi, and showed that we had covered fifty minutes of latitude in three marches. In these three marches we had passed the Norwegian record of 86.14 by Nansen and the Italian record of 86.34 by Cagni.

From this point Marvin turned back in command of the third supporting party. My last words to him were, "Be careful of the leads, my boy." The party from this point comprised 9 men, 7 sledges and 60 dogs.

The north march was over good going, but for the first time since leaving land we experienced that condition, frequent over these ice fields, of a hazy atmosphere in which the light is equal everywhere. All relief is destroyed, and it is impossible to see for any distance.

In the next march we encountered the heaviest and deepest snow of the journey, through a thick, smothering mantle lying in the depressions of heavy rubble ice. I came upon Bartlett and his party, fagged out and temporarily discouraged by the heart racking work of making a road. I rallied them a bit, lightened their sledges and sent them on, encouraged again.

A Narrow Escape.

During the next march we traveled through a thick, low lying, smoky haze drifting over the ice before a biting air from the northeast. At the end of the march we came upon the captain camped beside a wide open lead, with a dense black water sky northwest, north and northeast. We built our igloos and turned in, but before I had fallen asleep I was roused out by a movement of the ice and found a startling condition of affairs. A rapidly widening road of black water ran but a few feet from our igloos. One of my teams of dogs had escaped by only a few feet from being dragged by the movement of the ice into the water.

Another team had an equally narrow escape from being crushed by the ice blocks piled over them. The ice on the north side of the lead was moving around eastward. The small floe on which were the captain's igloos was drifting eastward in the open water, and the sides of our igloos threatened to follow suit.

Kicking out the doors of the igloos, I called to the captain's men to pack their sledges and be ready for a quick dash when a favorable chance arrived.

We hurried our things on our sledges, hitched the dogs and moved on to a large floe west of us. Then, leaving one man to look out for the dogs and sledges, we hurried over to assist the captain's party to join us.

A corner of their raft impinged on the ice on our side. For the rest of the night and during the next day the ice suffered the torments of the damned, surging together, opening out, groaning and grinding, while the open water belched black smoke like a prairie fire. Then the motion ceased, the open water closed, the atmosphere to the north was cleared, and we rushed across before the ice should open again.

A succession of laterally open leads were crossed, and after them some heavy old ice, and then we came to a layer of young ice, some of which buckled under our sledges, and this gave us a straight way of six miles to the north. Then came more heavy old floes covered with hard snow.

This was a good long march. The next march was also a long one. It was Bartlett's last hit. He let himself out over a series of large old floes steadily increasing in diameter and covered with hard snow.

During the last few miles I walked beside him or in advance. He was very solemn and anxious to go farther, but the program was for him to go back from here in command of the fourth supporting party, and there were no supplies for an increase in the main party.

In this march we encountered a high wind for the first time since the three days after we left Cape Columbia. It was dead on our faces, bitter and insistent, but I had no reason to complain. It was better than an easterly or southerly wind, either of which would have set us adrift in open water, while this was closing up every lead behind. This furnished another advantage of my supporting parties. True, by so doing it was pressing to the south the ice over which we traveled and so robbing us of a hundred miles of advantage.

Bartlett's Far North.

We concluded we were on or near the eighty-eighth parallel unless the north wind had lost us several miles. The wind blew all night and all the following day. At this camp in the morning Bartlett started to walk five or six miles to the north to make sure of reaching the eighty-eighth parallel.

Bartlett returned in time to take a satisfactory observation for latitude in clear weather and obtained for our position 87.48, and that showed that the continued north wind had robbed us of a number of miles of hard earned distance.

Bartlett took the observations here, as had Marvin five camps back, partly to save my eyes, but largely to give an independent record and determination of our advance. The observations completed and two copies made, one for him and the other for me, Bartlett started on the back trail in command of my fourth supporting party with 2 Eskimos, 1 sledge and 18 dogs.

With the disappearance of Bartlett I turned to the problem before me.

As for my party, my equipment and my supplies, I was in shape beyond my most sanguine dreams of earliest years. My party might be regarded as an ideal which had now come to realization.

Four of them carried the technique of dogs, sledges, ice and cold as their heritage. Two of them, Hansen and Ootah, were my companions to the farthest point three years before. Two others, Egingwah and Sigloo, were in Clark's division, which had such a narrow escape at that time. The fifth was a young man who was if possible even more willing and eager than the others for the princely gifts—a boat, a rifle, a shotgun, ammunition, knives, etc.—which I had promised, for he knew that these riches would enable him to wrest from a stubborn father the girl whose image filled his young heart.

He Plans Five Marches.

I had no fault to find with the conditions. My dogs were the very best, the pick of 122 with which we left Columbia. My sledges, now that the repairs were completed, were in good condition. My supplies were ample for forty days and, with the reserve represented by the dogs themselves, could be made to last fifty. I decided that I should strain every nerve to make five marches of fifteen miles each, crowding these marches in such a way as to bring us to the end of the fifth long enough before noon to permit the immediate taking of an observation for latitude.

Weather and leads permitting, I believed I could do this. If my proposed distances were cut down by any chance I had two means in reserve for making up the deficit:

First, to make the last march a forced one, stopping to make tea and rest the dogs, but not to sleep.

Second, at the end of the fifth march to make a forced march with a light sledge, a double team of dogs and one or two of the party, leaving the rest in camp.

Underlying all these calculations were a recognition of the ever present neighborhood of open leads and impassable water and the knowledge that a twenty-four hour gale would knock all my plans into a cocked hat and even put us in imminent peril.

At a little after midnight of April 1, after a few hours of sound sleep, I hit the trail, leaving the others to break up camp and follow. It was a fine morning. The wind of the last two days had subsided, and the going was the best and most equable of any I had had yet.

I set a good pace for about ten hours. Twenty-five miles took me well beyond the eighty-eighth parallel. While I was building my igloos a long lead formed by the east and southeast of us at a distance of a few miles. A few hours' sleep and we were on the trail again. The weather was fine and the going like that of the previous day, except at the beginning, when pick axes were required. This and a brief stop at another lead cut down our distance. But we had made twenty miles in ten hours and were halfway to the eighty-ninth parallel.

Again there was a few hours' stop, and we hit the trail before midnight. We marched something over ten hours, the dogs being often on the trot, and made twenty miles. Near the end of the march we rushed across a lead 100 yards wide, which buckled under our sledges and finally broke as the last sledge left it.

We stopped in sight of the eighty-ninth parallel in a temperature of 40 degrees below. Again a scant sleep and we were on our way once more and across the eighty-ninth parallel.

This march duplicated the previous one as to weather and going. The last few hours it was on young ice, and occasionally the dogs were galloping.

We made twenty-five miles or more, the air, the sky and the bitter wind burning the face till it crackled. It was like the great interior ice cap of Greenland. Even the natives complained of the bitter air. It was as keen as frozen steel.

A little longer sleep than the previous ones had to be taken here, as we were all in need of it, then on again.

Up to this time, with each successive march, our fear of an impossible lead had increased. At every inequality of the ice I found myself hurrying breathlessly forward, fearing that it marked a lead, and when I arrived at the summit would catch my breath with relief, only to find myself hurrying on in the same way at the next one.

But on this march, by some strange shift of feeling, this fear fell from me completely. The weather was thick, but it gave me no uneasiness.

Before I turned in I took an observation which indicated our position as 89.25. A dense, lifeless pall hung overhead. The horizon was black, and the ice beneath was a ghastly, chalky white, with no relief. A rise in temperature to 15 below reduced the friction of the sledges and gave the dogs the appearance of having caught the spirits of the party. The more sprightly ones, as they went along with tightly curled tails, frequently tossed their heads, with short, sharp barks and yelps. In twelve hours we made forty miles. There was no sign of a lead in the march.

"The Pole at Last!"

I had now made my five marches and was in time for a hasty noon observation through a temporary break in the clouds, which indicated our position as 89.57. I quote an entry from my journal some hours later:

"The pole at last—the prize of three centuries, my dream and goal for twenty years, mine at last! I cannot bring myself to realize it."

The first thirty hours at the pole were spent in taking observations, in going some ten miles beyond our camp and some eight miles to the right of it, in taking photographs, planting my flags, depositing my records, studying the horizon with my telescope for possible land and searching for a practicable place to make a sounding.

Ten hours after our arrival the clouds cleared before a light breeze from our left, and from that time until our departure in the afternoon of April 7 the weather was cloudless and flawless. The minimum temperature during the thirty hours was 33 below, the maximum 12.

The Return Journey.

We had reached the goal, but the return was still before us. It was essential that we reach the land before the next spring tide, and we must strain every nerve to do this.

I had a brief talk with my men. From now on it was to be a big travel, little sleep and a hustle every minute. We would try, I told them, to double march on the return—that is, to start and cover one of our northward marches, make tea and eat our lunch in the igloos, then cover another march, eat and sleep a few hours, and repeat this daily.

As a matter of fact, we nearly did this, covering regularly on our homeward journey five outward marches in three return marches. Just as long as we could hold the trail we could double our speed and we need waste no time in building new igloos.

In the afternoon of the 7th we started on our return, having double fed the dogs, repaired the sledges for the last time and discarded all our spare clothing to lighten the loads.

Five miles from the pole a narrow crack filled with recent ice, through which we were able to work a hole with a pickax, enabled me to make a sounding. All my wire, 1,500 fathoms, was sent down, but there was no bottom. In pulling up the wire parted a few fathoms from the surface, and lead and wire went to the bottom. Off went reel and handle, lightening the sledges still further. We had no more use for them now.

Three marches brought us back to the igloos where the captain turned back. The last march was in the wild sweep of a northerly gale, with drifting snow and the ice rocking under us as we dashed over it.

Traces of Marvin.

South of where Marvin had turned back we came to where his party had built several igloos while delayed by open leads. Still farther south we found where the captain had been held up by an open lead and obliged to camp. Fortunately, the movement of these leads was simply open and shut, and it took considerable water motion to fault the trail seriously.

While the captain, Marvin and, as I found out later, Borup had been delayed by open leads, we seemed to bear a patent charm, and at no single lead were we delayed more than a couple of hours. Sometimes the ice was fast and firm enough to carry us across; sometimes a short detour, sometimes a brief halt for the lead to close; sometimes an improvised ferry on an ice cake, kept the trail without difficulty down to the tenth outward march.

Igloos there disappeared completely and the entire region was unrecognizable. Where on the outward journey had been narrow cracks there were now broad leads, one of them over five miles in width, caught over with young ice.

Here again fortune favored us, and, no pronounced movement of the ice having taken place since the captain passed, we had his trail to follow. We picked up the old trail again north of the seventh igloos, followed it beyond the fifth and at the big lead lost it finally.

From here we followed the captain's trail, and on April 23 our sledges passed up the vertical edge of the glacier fringe a little west of Cape Columbia. When the last sledge came up I thought my Eskimos had gone crazy. They yelled and called and danced themselves helpless. As Ootah sat down on his sledge he remarked in Eskimo:

The Devil Asleep.

"The devil is asleep or having trouble with his wife or we never should have come back so easily."

A few hours later we arrived at Crane City, under the bluffs of Cape Columbia, and after putting four pounds of pemmican into each of the faithful dogs to keep them quiet we had at last our chance to sleep.

Never shall I forget that sleep at Cape Columbia. It was sleep, sleep, then turn over and sleep again.

Two days we spent here in sleeping and drying our clothes, then for the ship.

We reached Hecla in one march and the Roosevelt in another. When we got to the Roosevelt I was staggered by the news of the fatal mishap to Marvin. He had been either less cautious or less fortunate than the rest of us, and his death emphasized the risk to which we had all been subjected, for there was not one of us but had been in the sledge at some time during the journey.
